¶ The impact of migration on the role & status of women is examined. Topics discussed include: (1) scale & scope, selectivity, determinants, & consequences of female internal migration (FIM); (2) labor market aspects of FIM; (3) methodological issues in the study of FIM; & (4) policy issues relevant to FIM & women's role in development. Within these topics, special emphasis is given to determining the conditions that likely result in improvements to the status & role of women. D. ¶ Despite reduced fertility levels in many Meso-American countries (Mexico & Central America), the dramatic declines in mortality among infants & children have contributed to a new baby boom, 1950-1985. The impacts of this population growth on education, the economy, & migration are considered. The anticipated inability to provide jobs for the thousands of young adults entering the labor force in future years could result in significant increases in the number seeking to migrate north. Thus, the US is also vitally interested in these demographic shifts. A more unified regional approach to some of the social & economic problems facing these nations is needed, along with a more rational immigration policy on the part of the US. 5 Tables, 1 Figure, 8 References. ¶ Questionnaire data obtained in 1987 are used to investigate the immigration experience of Yugoslav women factory workers (N = 155) in West Berlin, Germany. The results show that although women are part of the global migration process, their position remains distinct from men's: eg, their work is evaluated differently, & they are relegated to special economic sectors with less chance for advancement. Women are concentrated in key processing & service activities where they perform difficult unskilled & semiskilled tasks, even though many are qualified for more sophisticated work. As a cheap, easily exploited labor force, they have little chance for education or job promotion, & are exposed to the vicissitudes of the economy. In general, economic downturns affect women, especially immigrants, before men. 4 Tables, 11 References. Adapted from the source document.

Among randomly selected respondents (N = 811 Russian & 509 Lithuanian), 4.6% of Russians & 2.4% of Lithuanians would leave the USSR with their families forever if they could (which, when multiplied by the population, results in 6.8 million persons). Many would go on shorter trips to the West, given the opportunity, as well–again, more Russians than Lithuanians. ¶ With the abolition of slavery in the British Empire in 1835, Australia was forced to find other sources of labor. From 1837 to 1900, immigration of Indian, Chinese, Afghan, & Kanaka workers made up the labor shortage. In 1901, however, the reactionary Immigration Restriction Act established a policy of white Australia & restricted immigration by imposing a diction test for all new immigrants During WWII, immigration was again encouraged as a matter of national security; but after the war, the white Australia policy reemerged. In the ensuing years the doors to immigration were gradually opened, first to non-British Europeans, then to non-Europeans, & then to mixed population groups & Asians. Immigration policy has transformed Australia from a British ethnic colony in the early 1800s to a Eurasian melting pot. D. Generoli

Representing the last major community of Jews likely to emigrate, the Soviet Jews are critically important to Israel. It is not clear whether Israel has the ability or the ideological commitment to absorb such large numbers. Resources to house & support Soviet Jews in Israel have been slow in coming; eg, not one new apartment has been built to house the new citizens, despite Israel's five-decade campaign to allow free immigration. Population data for major regions, population predictions, & labor skills needed in the future are analyzed, utilizing data drawn from UN, European Community, & individual nation sources. It is concluded that increased immigration is not needed to alleviate quantitative work force deficiencies for at least ten years. While immigration from Third World nations will continue, it will be irrelevant to Europe's economy. It is observed that Europe has substantial reserves of employable manpower, & high-level manpower continues to grow within Europe. ¶ The use of race & ethnic data from the 1991 UK Census to provide a standard with which to measure the success of equal employment opportunity policies under the Race Relations Act of 1976 is examined. Presently, available race & manpower data come from 1981 Census data; however, these statistics contain large gaps, are unreliable, & have resulted in a significant undercount of minorities. Labor Force Survey data is mentioned as an alternative source of data, but is unusable at the local level. ¶ The motivations, socioeconomic characteristics, & adaptation of Cuban & Dominican immigrants to Puerto Rico are examined through an analysis of secondary sources. Though the population size, urban concentration, specialization in commerce & services, & hybrid motivations to migrate are similar, timing of migration, residential patterns, mode of labor incorporation, & socioeconomic origins are different. Cubans immigrated in the late 1960s & early 1970s when the Puerto Rican economy was strong. They were predominantly urban dwellers with substantial levels of education & skill & were viewed as political exiles & valuable resources. They were quickly incorporated into the labor market & progressed up the economic ladder. Dominicans immigrated 1973-1986 when the Puerto Rican economy was stagnant. They tended to be rural dwellers with little education & low level skills, & were perceived as economic migrants intruding on the local job market. They were not readily incorporated into the labor market & started at the low rungs of the economic ladder. 7 Tables, 48 References. D. Generoli

¶ Although women are liberated from domestic life & are free to make reproductive choices, low birthrates have actually increased the woman's burden. In this report on a colloquium held 15-16 May 1990, sponsored by the Quebecois Council on the Status of Women, the complex links between production & reproduction are explored. Optimism prevails; despite the catastrophic predictions of the demographers, there have been slight increases in birthrates since 1988 in Quebec. Many women who want to participate in the work force also want children. Underlying these phenomena are structural changes in the social division of labor, which have contributed to the dualization & tertiarization of the labor market. 13 References. ¶ An investigation of whether economic processes explain a process of marriage postponement & a general decline in nuptiality during the depression of 1873-1896 in GB. Analysis of statistical data covering 1851-1911 shows substantial increases both in unemployment & in indoor pauperism during this period. It is also shown that milder nuptiality declines occurred in districts with rapid economic development. Some newspaper evidence suggests that, in general, people who lived through the period were aware of a depression & felt economically insecure. The significant associations between unemployment & the immediate nuptiality responses suggest that populations in history, as today, tended to alter their marriage behavior rapidly & effectively in response to socioeconomic change. 5 Tables, 1 Figure. Prior to migration, both Colombian & Dominican family groups tended to have complex, nonnuclear structures. After migration, nuclear family structures were prominent. Dominican families were more dependent on kinship resources & on a diversity of kin than Colombian families & were much more likely to be headed by a female. The differences in household composition & structure appear to be influenced by sociodemographic factors, eg, greater Colombian marriage before migration & the cyclical nature of migration. 5 Tables, 26 References. ¶ An articulation of demographic trends in the context of international migration notes that migration now occurs in all parts of the globe. Normal migration has been from the poor South to the rich North, but refugee migration threatens the integrity of the globally occurring nation-state. The restricted immigration policies of the rich democratic northern welfare states are reversed by those states' guarantees of basic human rights extended to asylum seekers. Although socioeconomic & demographic analyses prevail in studies of international migration, political factors are equally critical. Immigration was found to lower the labor participation rates of women who had previously worked abroad, but the economic needs associated with immigration appeared to force a considerable number of women who had not worked abroad into the labor force. Women in white-collar & professional occupations tended to remain in those occupations after immigration, but first time workers, those in pink-collar occupations, &, to a lesser extent, blue-collar workers experienced downward mobility. 6 Tables, 9 References. ¶ Three theoretical approaches to international immigrant incorporation are examined & evaluated that correspond to chronological periods: (1) during 1900-1969, "push & pull" & assimilation approaches focused mainly on the newcomer & less on the impact of immigration on host society; (2) beginning in the early 1970s, structural/conflict theories located international migration within an emerging economic & political world order; & (3) current perspectives emphasize multiculturalism, immigrants' political struggle through social movements, & citizenship rights as a source for social & political integration & conflict. It is contended here that although the theory of citizenship is not yet fully developed, it offers the best framework to theorizing immigrant-host interactions in the contemporary European context. 74 References. A historical survey of pre-WWI Belgian migration to the US provides a context for analyzing the political & economic factors that helped to keep Belgian citizens at home, including admirable industrial resources, liberal political rights, & the absence of an official emigration policy. Despite relatively low levels of emigration, three peak periods are identified: 1850-1856, farmers to Wisc; 1880-1893, glass-blowers & other skilled craftsmen to Ill; & 1901-1913, farmers to the Midwest & laborers to Pa. ¶ Asian immigration to Australia first became a major public policy issue in the mid-nineteenth century with the influx of Chinese & other nonwhite immigrant workers. However, after WWII, following a large-scale immigration program, pursued mainly for economic reasons, Australia opened its doors to other non-British European immigrants. In 1966, the immigration entry requirements were further liberalized to include a limited intake of non-Caucasians with professional & technical skills. A dramatic change occurred in 1973 when the 1901 Immigration Restriction Act was rescinded. Thereafter, a nondiscriminatory immigration policy was introduced. As a result, Australia's share of Asian migrants has increased sharply & conforms to the intake pattern of the US & Canada. However, contrary to the alarmist interpretation of the new policy, the overall figure for the Asian component of the Australian population remains only 3%-6%. Further, the broad-based social profile of Asian migrants reveals a positive picture of a group of settlers adapting well to a new environment. Aggregate data with regard to nearly all major social indicators--including crime rates, fertility levels, divorce rates, health status, & educational performance--show no significant differences between Asian & other migrant groups. A pattern of educational achievement & performance may partly account for the hostility toward Asian migrants: fear, envy, & distrust are derived from perceptions of these groups as economic competitors. 7 Tables, 40 References. ¶ According to the 1981 census, there were 529,000 persons of Ukrainian descent in Canada, making up 2.2% of the national population. Most Ukrainians arrived in three great waves: 1880-1914, 1920-1945, & 1945-1955. Recent immigration did not quantitatively or qualitatively change the character of this population to any significant degree. ¶ A preliminary analysis is presented of data from the Czechoslovak national census of 3 Mar 1991. The rate of population increase declined due to illegal emigration of 60,000 citizens, from 1981-1989. More than 54% of the population lived in towns or cities with populations of 10,000+. Ethnic minorities include 4.8 million Slovaks & 587,000 Hungarians; the German population is decreasing sharply. The census underestimated the number of Gypsies, which should be about 420,000. ¶ The ways in which household structures filtered economic changes to affect the processes of family formation in rural parts of the Loire Département, France, in the late nineteenth century are examined. The household structure, socioecnomic, & cultural models are drawn on to examine the relationships between socioeconomic structure & household structure, & between household structure & demographic behavior in an agricultural village (Verrières) & a protoindustrial sector (Saint-Hilaire). Secondary data show that household structure, nuptiality, & fertility were determined in part by the economy's labor needs. Comparison of Verrières & Saint-Hilaire indicates that their systems of economic structure, family structure, & demographic behavior were part of a culturally determined moral economy; however, the evidence falls short of suggesting that household structure solely determined demographic behavior. In the case of nuptiality & marital fertility, the socioeconomic model is less satisfactory than the cultural model. This finding suggests that not only economic development but also independent factors, eg, household structure, literacy, education, secularization, & the erosion of linguistic particularism, should be considered. 4 Tables, 1 Appendix, 55 References. ¶ Conflicts within & outside the antebellum German-American community emerged along economic, political, religious, & nationalistic lines. Analyses of these conflicts illuminate how social forces influence the formation of ethnic identity. While it is true that shared traditions, language, & experiences of discrimination temporarily united the immigrant community, economic, political, & religious polarization became evident by 1848 in the US & in Europe. Enlightenment principles furnished radical democrats with the means to identify & oppose conservative, authoritarian, & moralistic edicts, & opposition resulted in friction, which in turn influenced the future nature of social relations. This process can only be understood when ethnicity, religion, & cultural conflicts are not abstracted from their socioeconomic & political contexts. 1 Appendix. M. Maguire

¶ A report on a Nov 1991 two-day seminar organized by Friedrich Ebert Stiftung that examined the relationship between trade, foreign investment, & stay-at-home development. International emigration pressures & the supply of immigrants are on the rise, but at a time when industrial nations want to reduce their unskilled labor markets. Market & export-oriented reforms in developing countries may help to reduce emigration pressures but their impact will not be felt in the near future. Quick reduction of emigration pressures will likely require revision of trade & investment policies, but there is little consensus on the changes necessary. More consensus exists on the negative lessons of migration-controlling policies of the past: (1) migration begets more migration; (2) temporary migration leads to permanent migration; & (3) recruitment, remittances, & returns are not a short-cut to stay-at-home development. 1 Figure. McNicoll, Geoffrey (Research School Social Sciences Australian National U, Canberra ACT 2601), Changing Fertility Patterns and Policies in the Third World, UM Annual Review of Sociology, 1992, 18, 85-108.

¶ Though average fertility in the Third World declined from the 1960s to the 1980s, population growth adds nearly one billion people a decade to the world. Differences in social & political organization, economic conditions, cultural orientation, & policy directions yield distinctive paths of fertility decline. Explanations of these differences exhibit the range & variety of theories of social change in general. Matters of contention include the appropriate scope of an economic calculus in fertility decision making & the relative significance of structural & cultural content in characterizing the decision environment & its sources of change. Fertility research needs to take a less microanalytic theoretical perspective & give greater attention to the public choice dimensions of fertility policy. 3 Figures, 135 References. ¶ The social impact of Benito Mussolini's 1938 anti-Semitic laws, which restricted the rights of foreigners in Italy, is assessed. Close exploration of the situation in Trieste just before & after passage of the laws reveals that a large number of Jews, Italian or foreign, lost their jobs & were forced to leave the country to look for work. Of those remaining in Trieste, many felt compelled to abjure from the synagogue, convert to Catholicism, &/or maintain silence about the laws. Personal correspondence between Jews in Italy & migrants from Trieste to the US illuminate reactions & indicate how individual lives were transformed. Interviews (N not given) with surviving migrants & first-generation Italian-American children augment the analysis. M. Maguire

Monk, Janice (Southwest Instit Research Women U Arizona, Tucson 85721), Asian Professionals as Immigrants: The Indians in Sydney, Population Review, 1991, 35, 1-2, Jan-Dec, 90-103.

¶ Patterns of residence & social interaction among Indian immigrants in Sydney, Australia, by the mid-1970s are examined, assessing the extent to which theories of immigrant settlement based primarily on studies of low income people of rural origins apply to middle-class professional people, taking into account the additional variable of race as a basis for possible discrimination. Following a brief review of Australia's history of exclusionary immigration policies & the gradual modification of their racial component between the late 1960s & 1973, the nature of Asian immigration to the mid-1970s is documented using secondary statistical sources. To assess residential patterns of Indians in Sydney, the research draws on records of ethnic organizations, university faculty directories, & telephone listings of Indian-surnamed medical practioners, as well as personal referrals. It is concluded that, as of 1975/76, Indians were widely dispersed in the metropolitan area. Interviews with 50 families reveal that residential choice reflected preferences for proximity to employment, environmental considerations, family status, & age, rather than affiliation with an ethnic community or discrimination in the real estate market. Those surveyed participated in the wider Australian community, with professional connections providing the principal basis for social life. Nevertheless, the majority of the immigrants maintained some ties with ethnic organizations or socialized with friends of ethnic subgroups within the Indian population. 3 Tables. AA

Murphy, Terrence (Memorial U Newfoundland, Saint Johns A1C 5S7), Religion and Ethnicity in Canadian Historiography, Studi Emigrazione/Etudes Migrations, 1991, 28, 103, Sept, 305-318.

¶ Canadian historians have traditionally defined the connections between religion & ethnicity too narrowly, limiting study to ethnic identification & interethnic conflict. A more expansive consideration of religion & ethnicity enables researchers to conceptualize collective identity as a process of negotiation. Toward this end, religion must be formulated as more than just institutional membership; properly understood, religion is a way of interpreting life. It then becomes possible to ask how new Canadian immigrants use religion to aid in their adjustment. As a first step, six basic topics are addressed: religion & Canadian origins, religion & ethnic awareness, immigration & religious commitment, ethnicity & change, religious affiliation & economics, & religion & national unity. In addition, examples from Canadian historiography are cited to suggest the promise of future research. M. Maguire

¶ Compiling data from sources in Istria, civil Croatia, & Dalmatia, it is estimated that 1,150,000 emigrants left Croatia for other European countries & overseas from the mid-nineteenth century to the 1981 census. This emigration represents 33% of the average standing population or 38% of the overall natural increment. Immigration to Croatia from countries outside Yugoslavia is estimated at 300,000, well below the level to replace emigrants. After WWII, 325,000 Croatians left, complicating the problems of an aging population & declining natality. Thus, emigration significantly intensified unfavorable demographic trends. 3 Tables, 39 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ To analyze different aspects of rural migration, questionnaire data were obtained from 599 residents of Croatia & 422 of Bosnia & Herzegovina in 1989/90. Key topics include: migration from the countryside to the cities, basic reasons for migration, demographic profile of migrants (sex, age, educational level, profession), & comparison with nonmigrant workers in both cities & towns. Educational disparities are already beginning to show signs of decrease as the intensity of migration begins to diminish. Improvements in the status of more recent migrants during the 1980s became less pronounced as crises led to an increasingly closed socialist society. 3 Tables, 19 Graphs, 21 References. Pfister, Ulrich (Humanities Faculty U Zurich, CH-8057 Switzerland), The Protoindustrial Household Economy: Toward a Formal Analysis, Journal of Family History, 1992, 17, 2, spring, 201-232.

¶ A number of tenets of traditional protoindustrial theory have been challenged by recent studies on the household structure & demographic evolution of protoindustrial communities in early modern Europe. This recent work contradicts earlier views that: the protoindustrial household was small & of simple composition, work roles were characterized by weak age & gender differentials, & family organization fostered demographic growth. It is argued that the problems of protoindustrial theory reside less in fundamental weaknesses of the concept than in a priority of phenomenological over structural analysis. In an attempt to provide formal structure to the analysis of the organization of the protoindustrial household economy, a simple model of the decision-making process by which rural households allocated their labor between the agricultural & industrial sectors is presented that allows the formulation of several hypotheses regarding the size & composition of households, as well as the demographic corollaries of protoindustrialization. The differentiation of work roles with regard to gender & age, & the allocation of labor over time spans of differing length–eg, seasons & life cycles–are also discussed. 3 Tables, 1 Appendix, 62 References. ¶ The rapidly growing world population is increasing pressures on the global environment, threatening its ability to supply itself with adequate amounts of food, water, & fuel & with a quality environment. Additionally, increased use of fossil fuels, deforestation, & other human activities are elevating levels of carbon dioxide & other greenhouse gases in the atmosphere. The projected global warming is expected to increase temperatures generally & reduce rainfall & water availability to crops, especially in the temperate regions. Ways that these negative effects can be offset to some degree are suggested, including soil & water conservation, alteration of crop varieties, improvement of pest control technologies, implementation of crop rotation, & development of other sound ecological technologies for resource use in agriculture. 112 References. ¶ Parameters of the indigenous category "Canadian" are examined through analysis of 1988/89 National Census Tests (N = 34,000 & 7,900 Canadian households, respectively). Cultural labeling of a country's population is impacted by external factors, eg, world immigration patterns & by internal factors, eg, political & nationalistic movements of resident ethnic-cultural groups. As societies mature & evolve, there is an increasing tendency for populations to see themselves as indigenous to the society in which they live. Evidence of this process exists in Canada. Location within Canada & mother tongue of respondents reporting "Canadian" as the ethnic origin of their parents & grandparents or as their own ethnic identity are important indicators for this emerging ethnic category. 7 Tables, 43 References. ¶ Over the last few decades, rural Croatia has undergone substantial transformations. In many areas, the population has decreased markedly. A smaller proportion of the remaining residents obtained their income from agricultural activities. These general trends are shown via analysis of official census data 1857-1991 for the Imotski district. Harsh poverty in rural areas combined with a strong desire for social mobility led many people to migrate both to big cities in Croatia & to destinations outside Yugoslavia. Remittances from family members working abroad currently supplement the income local residents derive from small farming & employment in nonagricultural activities. This social & economic symbiosis is a response to the demographic recession of the region. 11 Tables. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Many problems have been encountered with official censuses in both parts of Germany. In the former West Germany, the most recent census overestimated the number of housing units by over 1,000,000, while in the former East Germany, even greater mistakes were made. Participation in the German microcensuses (Allbus, Sowi-Bus, the Welfare Survey, & the Socioeconomic Panel) is entirely voluntary, achieving a return rate of about 66% & leading to greater uncertainty of the results. The census represents a considerable investment in time & money, & it is essential that the government obtains high-quality information in return. ¶ The currently ambiguous stand by French immigration policymakers is influenced by public opinion. Reviewing France's long history of immigration, two phases are distinguished: the postwar reconstruction & economic expansion (1946-1974), & the post-1974 period. The rapid growth of the economy before 1974, the society's urbanization, & advances in schooling contributed to the establishment of labor exchange & family immigration agreements with Algeria, Portugal, Tunisia, Morocco, & Spain. The permissive immigration policy was replaced by strict controls fueled by xenophobia & increased unemployment following the 1974 economic crisis. Although less restricted, family migration was also reduced. Today's policy promotes integration & features a cash bonus incentive for prospective returnees. While immigration's regional impact has been felt primarily in the larger metropolitan areas, cases of chain migration to Portugal are noted in some small rural towns. While the free circulation of European Economic Community (EEC) citizens after 1993 is not predicted to produce mass labor transfers between member states, the exclusion of non-EEC nationals from this community may accelerate the clandestine employment market. 1 Table. ¶ US Census data for 1983 are used to examime regional differences in interstate return migration patterns 1975-1980. Two variables are employed in the analysis: the % of inmigrants to a state who are returnees, & the number of returnees as a share of those at risk for returning. Findings show that: states display disparate return characteristics for each variable; the % of inmigrants who were returnees ranged from 3.2% in Nev to 33.9% in WVa; the % of return migrants is not significantly correlated with the at risk return variable; & some states, eg, WVa, have a high % of returnees among inmigrants but a low at-risk return rate, while other states, eg, Calif, receive a large portion of at-risk returnees but display a low % return among all inmigrants. A typology to classify states according to their return characteristics is developed, & implications of the different return patterns are discussed. A need to decompose interstate migration flows when modeling patterns of human movement on a national scale is identified. 2 Tables, 5 Figures. Adapted from the source document.

Based on a nominative record-linking study that localizes a family's use of the city's sanitary systems, seasonal variations in infant death are charted, pointing to the trend of greater deaths during the summer. Proximity to an unimproved sewer also contributed to infant death, especially among the Wc. ¶ The sociobiological theory of kinship altruism relies heavily on the concept of genetic relatedness: genes that code for altruistic acts toward closely related genetic kin can overcome selection pressures favoring self-interested behavior. However, genetic relatedness declines rapidly as kinship becomes more distant, thereby restricting genetically-based altruism to very close kin. Here, these notions are extended to cultural relatedness, arguing that oblique & horizontal transmission can yield high levels of cultural relatedness in larger groups. A mathematical model of cultural transmission is proposed, & equilibria for several special cases are investigated. Analysis indicates that the equilibrium level of relatedness is critically dependent on the influence of exogenous sources. In models with equal influence of nonparents, level of relatedness varies inversely with group size, while it does not when nonparental influence is concentrated on a single individual. 1 Table, 7 Figures, 1 Appendix, 10 References. ¶ Current models posit that reciprocity is unlikely to evolve in large groups as a result of natural selection: reciprocators punish noncooperation by withholding future cooperation, thus also penalizing cooperators in the group. Here, a model in which the response is some form of punishment directed solely at noncooperators, refered to as retribution, is developed. It is shown that cooperation enforced by retribution can lead to the evolution of cooperation in two qualitatively different ways: (1) If benefits of cooperation to an individual are greater than the costs to a single individual of coercing the other n - 1 individuals to cooperate, then strategies that cooperate & punish noncooperators, strategies that cooperate only if punished, &, sometimes, strategies that cooperate but do not punish will coexist in the long run. (2) If the costs of being punished are large enough, moralistic strategies that cooperate, punish noncooperators, & punish those who do not punish noncooperators can be evolutionarily stable. However, moralistic strategies can cause any individually costly behavior to be evolutionarily stable, whether or not it creates a group benefit. 1 Figure, 1 Appendix, 28 References. ¶ It has been argued by many that, if we are to survive, we must achieve a worldwide decline of fertility, combined with the development of technology & economy. Sociobiology is rather pessimistic about this, since it is the essence of human nature to reproduce & multiply. Nonetheless, there are reasons to believe that humankind will be able to achieve this decline, a thesis supported by a less monocausal form of sociobiology, namely, one that takes into account the genetic or natural & the cultural makeup of human beings. 15 References. ¶ During the first two years of life a common neural substrate, roughly corresponding to Broca's area, underlies the hierarchical organization of elements in the development of speech & the capacity to combine objects manually, including tool use. Subsequent cortical differentiation creates distinct, relatively modular capacities. It is hypothesized that an evolutionary homologue of this neural substrate provided a foundation for the evolution of language before the divergence of hominids & the great apes. Sharp, Keith (Nene Coll, Moulton Park Northampton NN2 7AL England), Biology and Social Science: A Reply to Ted Benton, Sociology, 1992, 26, 2, May, 219-224.

Reply, 225-232.

¶ A critique of Ted Benton's argument (see SA 39:4/91X9355) that to accept a broadly neo-Darwinian theory of biological evolution does not necessitate acceptance of a reductionist account of human behavior, & that not only is an integration of biological & sociological theories of human behavior possible, but it can be achieved without any alteration to the conceptual & causal assumptions of conventional social science. The lack of any systematic discussion of two nonadaptive routes to evolution that Benton mentions produces a rather misleading picture of their biological validity. However, the greatest difficulty with Benton's analysis lies in his interpretation of natural selection itself as potentially supporting a nonreductionist account of the biological basis of human social capacities. It is argued that to assume that existing accounts of human evolution ignore the selective influence of the social environment is to ignore the entire body of sociobiological literature. In Why the Welcome Needs to Be Cautious: A Reply to Keith Sharp, Benton (U of Essex, Wivenhoe Park Colchester CO4 3SQ England) argues that the original argument did not propose to return to forms of biological reductionism, nor advocate a general program of integration or an explanatory reduction of social to biological phenomena or processes. Furthermore, a weaker & a stronger claim about the relation between biological & social scientific theories were not distinguished. 15 References. S. Millett

¶ A description of the development & construction of a qualitative way-of-life interview instrument for use with children. Explored are issues regarding reliability, children's representations of their interactions, & facilitation of reporting. It is concluded that age does not change the procedure, but represents surmountable challenges. 1 Table, 35 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The relationship between immigrant children's adjustment to school & parental attitudes toward social change is examined through questionnaires measuring demographics, behavioral adjustment, language competence, & attitudes collected from 51 Soviet immigrant & 51 native US Jewish children (all Ss are in grades 1-8 at the Hebrew Academy of San Francisco, Calif) & their parents. A significant positive relationship was found between adjustment to school & parental attitudes toward change for both native US & Soviet immigrant children. This relationship remained after controlling for the effects of parental education, family socioeconomic status, children's age, intelligence, English-language competence, & immigrant/native status. Mothers' & fathers' attitudes toward social change had different effects on the adjustment of sons & daughters: fathers' attitudes were significantly associated with the adjustment of both daughters & sons while mothers' attitudes were associated only with the adjustment of daughters. 13 Tables, 18 References. ¶ In light of the belief by behavioral psychologists that the personality of an individual is governed by early childhood experiences, questionnaire & scale data obtained from 290 preschoolers & their mothers in 3 areas of India are used to explore the development of two behaviors, namely, aggression & dependency, in female children, & to relate these behaviors to discriminatory childrearing practices. 3 Tables, 23 References. ¶ An examination of contemporaneous & longitudinal associations of maternal & paternal measures of family functioning with observation & questionnaire data collected from 152 Caucasian children ages 5-14 concerning sibling conflict. An effort is also made to determine whether the ways in which families attempt to solve siblings' problems are associated with contemporaneous & longitudinal assessment of sibling conflict. Results indicate that paternal equality of treatment & family harmony during family discussions about sibling problems, as well as parents' perceptions of family cohesiveness, are associated with lower sibling conflict levels. 4 Tables, 44 References. (SCR)

¶ The family & the consistency of the world for which it functions as an intermediary for the child are extremely important in the primary socialization process. For immigrant families the sociocultural model learned at home usually reflects the country of origin, sometimes hindering successful socialization in the host country. Examination of official data on Yugoslav immigrants to France shows that the foreign conditions in which an immigrant family is immersed do not necessarily cause unsuccessful socialization of the younger generation. Such success depends on the degree to which the host society welcomes the immigrants, on the individual family, & on the young people themselves. 22 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ In an examination of the first year of a pilot project begun in 1987 in an English county, evaluated is the conduct of 44 videotaped interviews between suspected victims of child sexual abuse & police officers & social workers investigating the allegation. The place of children's testimony in contemporary law is illustrated by several extracts from transcripts of interviews with suspected child victims. In a field dominated by psychological approaches to interview design & analysis, it is argued that sociology has a worthwhile contribution to make, with clear consequences for investigators' understandings of children's evidence. 1 Table, 41 References. ¶ A sociology of knowledge perspective informs this examination of the cognitive & commonsense categories of family & childbearing. Current demographic changes in the Quebecois family are reflected in the emergence of childhood as a topic of discourse. Data from life stories, autobiographies, love letters, & interviews (N not specified) suggest that the production of discourse about children has replaced, rhetorically speaking, the actual production of children. In the current period of slow population growth, the creation of a family through biological reproduction constitutes a choice, a space-time construction within the family. 2 Tables, 41 References. Kawahara, Kazue, Transliterated title not available (The Age of Innocence–Doshinshugi during the Taisho Period), Soshioroji, 1992, 36, 3, Feb, 53-70. (JPN)

¶ During the Taisho era, modern children's literature was established in Japan, with the magazine Akai Tori dedicated to the development of stories (dowa) & poetry (doyo) specifically for them. Writers of the period emphasized children's purity & innocence, & sought to create works that reflected the "childlike mind" (doshin); literature from this period is known as doshinshugi. Manifestations of this preoccupation with childhood innocence within the larger sociocultural context are explored here, noting: (1) the influence of Western images of children; (2) attitudes toward motherhood that reflected the male-dominated culture; (3) the "invention of Japanese traditions," eg, the "childlike heart" of the priest Ryokan; & (4) the idea of childlike innocence as an image of self-liberation that mediated conflicts in this literature between a Western frame of reference & real Japanese society. 38 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An examination of why Icelandic school children are more accident-prone than children in other modern countries, drawing on secondary data regarding children's outdoor habitats, & parents' & children's perceptions of environmental threats. An interpretive framework is developed that includes sociohistorical, instititional, & adult-child interactional contexts. Results indicate that, compared to Scandinavian children, Icelandic children have less adult supervision in their everyday environments. Factors contributing to this situation are outlined. 3 Tables, 10 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Data obtained via the Semantic Differential Scale & the Self-Esteem Inventory are used to investigate perceptions of self, family, & school in a sample of 240 Indian children & adolescents ages 10-18 from Chatsworth (a lower socioeconomic-status suburb of Durban, Republic of South Africa), comparing respondents (Rs) from intact, widowed, & divorced families. Results indicate that children from divorced families view their fathers significantly more negatively & their teachers more positively than those from intact & widowed families. Primary school children perceive the self, family, teacher, & school more positively than do secondary school children; this difference is most distinct (for perceptions of family & teacher) in the intact group & least distinct in the divorced group. Theoretical & practical implications of those findings are discussed. 1 Table, 37 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Sex & age differences in childrens' play styles & the relationship between sex-typed play styles & children's acceptance within peer groups were investigated, drawing on data obtained via a sociometric rating scale & observations of 86 second-grade & 81 fourth-grade students at an Ontario grade school. Analysis indicates that boys engaged in more aggressive & rough play, as well as more functional, solitary-dramatic, & exploratory play, & tended to be involved more in group play. Girls produced more parallel & constructive play as well as more peer conversation. In grade 4, boys produced more games-with-rules & girls exhibited more parallel-constructive activity. Only among fourth-grade boys was male-preferred play significantly correlated with popularity among same-sex classmates, & was female-preferred play correlated with popularity among opposite sex peers. Results suggest that the salience of typical boy/girl play increased with age. 3 Tables, 46 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Socioeconomic (SE) inequalities in child health in Australia are investigated, drawing on data on pregnancy outcomes & 1 indicator of child health–developmental delay–for a sample of 7,614 women in Brisbane followed over a 5-year period. Three indicators of SE status (chronic SE disadvantage, mother's education, & family income) were used to predict child developmental delays at age 5. Analysis of children's standardized test scores & maternal questionnaire responses reveals that mothers lowest in SE status (using any of the indicators) had substantially higher rates of children manifesting developmental delays. 4 Tables, 1 Appendix, 37 References. ¶ The working conditions of female (F) children in India are explored via census & other data. Highlighted are the lower status & value of F child labor vis-à-vis that of their male counterparts, at home & outside. In addition to occupational hazards, F children are also vulnerable to sexual abuse both at the place of employment & at home. Since poverty is the main reason for child labor, Fs from poor backgrounds, who have other traditional social disadvantages, risk severe exploitation. Suggestions are made to alleviate the the F child plight resulting from the double curse of being F & a laborer. 2 Tables, 14 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An interview with Mary Masechaba Mabaso, the leader of the first march against sexual assault in the history of South Africa, Feb 1990. Mabaso maintains that girls in Soweto are no longer safe at home, in the streets, or in the schools due to the escalating problem of rape by "Jack-rollers" & other gangs. Discussed are the background & purpose of the march & Mabaso's multidisciplinary theory of rape that includes psychological & sociological perspectives. She argues that rape keeps the women of Soweto subordinate to men by restricting their freedom of movement & chance at an education. The analysis reveals how gender bias can distort the work of otherwise well-qualified researchers on rape. 40 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The family types of 20 maladjusted vs adjusted 3-year-olds (per teacher rating) attending a day care center in Tel-Aviv, Israel, were classified according to the Reiss Card Sort. Although all 3 family types–environment-sensitive (ES), distance-sensitive (DS), & consensus-sensitive (CS)–were found, the maladjusted children came mainly from the less optimal family types (DS & CS). Differences were also found between mothers' & fathers' evaluation of their children's behavior problems across the 3 family types. Results are discussed in terms of the family's role in the development of early psychopathology. 2 Tables, 1 Figure, 13 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Theories of family influence on children's reading behavior must be considered tentative in light of the scarcity of research, the infrequency of clear-cut results, & the sharp loss of function of the family in this century. Studies undertaken in the Netherlands & abroad are reviewed. Results support the view that positive parental attitudes toward reading, frequent literacy interactions in the home, & a book-rich home environment enhance reading development. Reading aloud & talking about books are the most effective types of interaction. An explanation is suggested for the frequently observed difference between lower-class home environments, with a negative effect on reading development, & other environments: sociohistorical processes have resulted in high valuation of the development of internal controls among middle-class families, & these abilities in a child facilitate reading activities, which demand a large measure of self-discipline, emotional self-control, & capacity to distance oneself from the immediate environment. 93 References. ¶ In a comparison of 248 adolescents living in a southern metropolitan area with various musical preferences, survey data collected in 1990 reveal that those preferring hard rock or heavy metal music reported higher rates of reckless behavior, including driving while intoxicated or over eighty miles per hour; casual sex, often without contraception; drug use; shoplifting; & vandalism. Higher levels of sensation seeking, negative family relationships, & among girls, low self-esteem, were also found. It was concluded that adolescents who are high in sensation seeking are attracted to hard rock & heavy metal music as well as to reckless behavior perhaps because of the high intensity of sensation they provide. 4 Tables, 29 References. ¶ Early research & theory on adolescence in the Netherlands emphasized the physiological determinants of teenage behavior & later turned to the interaction between parent & child. The conflicts of adolescence were viewed as part of a normal transition, where tensions hidden from early childhood came to the surface. In the 1930s, new theories postulated a negative phase in early adolescence, followed by a positive phase of mental growth. After WWII, pedagogues hoped that parents would become the primary teachers of their adolescent children & parents were advised to give more freedom to their teenagers. Later, psychoanalysis shifted the attention of specialists to younger children, & adolescence was no longer regarded as a pathogenic source of personality disorders. M. Meeks

¶ The meaning of newspapers to young adults is explored, drawing on autobiographical data from 164 undergraduates at a midwestern US university. Results demonstrate how young adults are introduced to newspapers as children, interact with them in the school years, & eventually become regular users. Although they acknowledge the received definition of newspapers as factual sources for citizens, young adults experience the newspaper as a ritual, a symbol, & a tool. They consider the facts in newspapers boring & unrelated to their lives. 15 References. Adapted from the source document.

Vocational training & paid employment are still highly rated, & there is an equal degree of optimism & pessimism about future job prospects. Despite decreased training & job opportunities, young people are clear about what they want to achieve & express a greater feeling of personal freedom regarding their job options. ¶ The changing international relations illustrated by the Persian Gulf war were instrumental in prompting Germans to start thinking about the role their newly reunified nation would play. Although it seems unlikely that the German Constitution will be amended to allow German troops to participate in conflicts on foreign soil, a noticeable number of 18-year-old youths are opting to do peaceful work in lieu of being drafted into the army. ¶ Reported is a 22-year prospective study of African-American adolescents from a probability sample of households in central Harlem, New York City, focusing on their health problems, substance use & other health behaviors, & treatment needs. Data obtained since 1968 have been used for planning the local municipal hospital's adolescent service & for informing drug policy & community education activities regarding trajectories in & out of drug use, focusing chiefly on heroin & polydrug use. Current investigation focuses on drug use & sexual practices as risk behavior in human immunodeficiency virus infection. ¶ Telephone interview data obtained from a sample of 522 adolescents ages 10-18 in 2 northern Calif counties approximately 4.5 years after their parents' divorce are drawn on to explore adolescents' feeling of being caught between parents to see whether this construct helps to explain (1) variability in their postdivorce adustment & (2) associations between family/child characteristics & adolescent adjustment. Results indicate that feeling caught between parents was related to high parental conflict & hostility & low parental cooperation. Being close to both parents was associated with low feelings of being caught. The relation between time spent with each parent & feeling caught depended on the coparenting relationship. Adolescents in dual residence were especially likely to feel caught when parents were in high conflict, & especially unlikely to feel caught when parents cooperated. Feeling caught was related to poor adjustment outcomes. Parental conflict was only related to adjustment outcomes indirectly, through adolescents' feelings of being caught. 7 Tables, 2 Figures, 41 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ An exploration of the role & position of Korean youth in the society at large & in the family, based on a review of recent research & the theoretical literature. Several reasons are suggested for current intergenerational conflict: different life contexts; the unclear line of recession of parental authority (traditionally exerted over adult children); & psychological & social differences due to varying outlooks & levels of experience. It is noted that the traditional authoritarianism in the family is diminishing rapidly as a result of more modern views of individualism, liberalism, & rationalism, but also due to the contemporary role of government & the society in providing protection & security for the individual. The general affluence of Korean society affords most youth the opportunity for better education & a higher standard of living than that enjoyed by their parents at the equivlent age. These apparent advantages, however, create new problems, including self-centeredness & inappropriate expectations. Adolescents must also be taught responsible behavior & urged to participate in socially meaningful activities. 14 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ To determine whether guardians, usually grandparents, are suitable substitutes for parents, interview data were obtained from Croatian children (N = 134 in grades 4-6) in Medimurje whose parents were working abroad. Findings suggest that elderly guardians' age & low educational level do not allow them to keep up culturally & emotionally with the children. Children show respect & appreciation for the care they are given, but their primary emotional bonds do not shift to the grandparents. Rather than affection, their attitude toward guardians is one of duty, debt, & respect for the sacrifices made in fulfilling parental functions. It is concluded that temporary guardians are not substitutes for parents in spite of their benevolent desire to be so. 4 Tables, 9 References. Adapted from the source document. Claes, Michel E. (Dépt psychologie U Montréal, Quebec H3C 3J7), Friendship and Personal Adjustment during Adolescence, Journal of Adolescence, 1992, 15, 1, Mar, 39-55.

¶ A sample of 349 French-speaking Montreal, Quebec, teenagers from 2 public schools were administered a questionnaire assessing their network of friends (expectations & degrees of intimacy/attachment, & amount of conflict with friends), & another questionnaire measuring personal adjustment as variations in emotional tone, impulse control, mastery of the external world, & psychopathology. A multiple regression analysis of the personal adjustment scores reveals that a high quality attachment to friends without conflicts was related to personal adjustment, but that size of friendship network was not. The friendship network varied little for either sex or age. Generally, girls expect more & are more attached & intimate with their friends than are boys. Good communication between friends leads to adaptive behavior, while poor communication, confrontation, or alienation result in maladaptive behavior. 4 Tables, 29 References. ¶ The influence of suicidal others & perceptions of the causes of peer suicide on adolescent suicidal behavior is examined, drawing on questionnaire data from 473 eleventh & twelfth grade high school students & their families in the northeastern US. Of the respondents (Rs), 23% reported self-injurious behavior & 6.7% reported suicide attempts. Though "too much pressure" was perceived as the primary cause of suicide, males tended to attribute this to issues of achievement, while females attributed it to more interpersonal concerns. Knowledge of others who had attempted suicide had an impact on suicide & related behavior: while 75% of those reporting self-injurious behavior knew another person who had attempted suicide, only 49.8% of students reporting no such behavior knew a suicide attempter, & fully 93% of adolescents who had attempted suicide knew another person who had made such an attempt. 2 Tables, 20 References. ¶ Two interpretations of changing values in contemporary Western societies are compared. Ronald Inglehart (Kultureller Umbruch. Wertewandel in der westlichen Welt [Cultural Change. Value Shifts in the Western World], Frankfurt/New York, 1989) advances a socialization hypothesis to describe the change from materialistic to postmaterialistic values. Helmut Klages, on the other hand (Wertorientierungen im Wandel. Rückblick, Gegenwartsanalyse, Prognosen [Value Orientations in Transition. Past, Present, Future], Frankfurt/New York, 1984), sees a temporary & unique shift in values occurring 1965-1975, in which duty & acceptance were superceded by self-actualization. Both models, however, assign primary importance to the role of young people as instruments of value change, though with different emphasis. A selection of books published 1980-1991 on the subject is briefly summarized. 9 Photographs. Adapted from the source document.

¶ To explore differences in how young adults plan their life course, questionnaire data were obtained in 1991 from Dutch young adults (N = 687, average age 23.9). Most plan their lives in 5 age-related stages: 14-17, 18-20, 21-24, 25-34, & post-35. Several clear differences are seen between males (Ms) & females (Fs). Fs attain transitions at an earlier age, work with more compressed time schedules, & change from one phase to another more synchronically. However, no differences were found between Ms & Fs in terms of the precision of the time tables & the possible rejections of some part of the common life course. More interdisciplinary & longitudinal research on life course is needed. 4 Tables, 1 Figure, 28 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Delinquent teens (N = 112) from 2 residential detention facilities in Ohio & a normative sample of adolescents (N = 141) from 2 Ohio public high schools were administered the Chronic Self-Destructiveness Scale (CSDS) & the Psychopathic Deviate & Hypomania subscales of the Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory (MMPI) to evaluate adolescent self-defeating behavior. It was predicted that delinquents would score high on the CSDS, & that this would correlate with higher scores on the MMPI subscales. Findings support the predictions, suggesting that delinquents' personality traits are linked with increased chronic self-destructiveness. Although other cultural factors may contribute, societal factors are not considered relevant. 2 Tables, 13 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ To determine what role parents play in adolescents' transition to further education or entry into the work force after secondary school, longitudinal interview data were obtained from 120 Dutch youth to monitor changes in their decision-making strategies between ages 16 & 20. Different styles of interaction between parents & children can be related to changes in youth trajectories. Interaction styles linked to negotiation lead to more highly individualized career paths, & those based on obedience to authority to less individualization. 7 Tables, 45 References. ¶ To investigate gender-related differences in job satisfaction, interview data were obtained 1982-1988 from 200 teachers in Frankfurt, West Germany. Analysis reveals that for females (Fs), self-concept as a teacher is closely tied to reaching & interacting with students on an emotional level, while male (M) teachers are more oriented toward an objective presentation of course material. Fs find the task of grading student work somewhat stressful, worrying about the impact of their evaluation on the students, while for most Ms this is not so problematic. Rather than trying to develop personal relationships with students as Fs do, Ms are more likely to resort to didactic tricks to teach the material. About 70% of F respondents feel that teaching places an emotional overburden on them, compared to 34% of Ms. Fs' problems are compounded by their tendency to fantasize about the extent of their influence on others. Most F teachers find time to relax & seek support from each other & from their M colleagues. 8 References. M. Meeks

¶ Data from the 1987/88 National Survey of Families & Households are drawn on to explore the influence of adolescent childbearing & marriage on the likelihood of high school completion among a cohort of 1,778 women ages 20-29. Use of event history techniques reveals striking differences by ethnicity: though the effect of teen marriage on school completion was significant only for whites, adolescent childbearing had much stronger deleterious effects for Latinas than for white or especially black teens; black mothers were most likely to complete high school. Data on ethnic differences in attitudes toward marriage, family, & education are presented to explain these differences. 4 Tables, 1 Figure, 27 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Ireland's dominant youth service providers (the government, the Catholic church, & voluntary organizations) have traditionally promoted community-based services because they have assumed that accessibility & participation are enhanced by local provision. It is argued here, however, that these efforts are continually undercut because the two crucial terms "community" & "youth" are assumed to represent unified, homogeneous categories, when in fact they do not. Leaving these terms unproblematized results in an inability to understand & account for real class, gender, & ethnic differences & local conflict. These issues are highlighted through interviews (N not specified) with 3 different categories of young people involved in the establishment of youth services in Ballinaclasha parish, Cork. 32 References. ¶ With the transition to a free market economy in the East German states has come changed demands in both agricultural & industrial production. Impacts of this for the employment prospects of young people are discussed, comparing the situation of 60 rural youth from the village of Jörgenstorf with that of 540 of their urban peers in Leipzig in 1990; longitudinal data collected from 1,300 students in Leipzig since 1985 are also analyzed. It is demonstrated how these youth, especially those in rural areas, are extremely uncertain about their future employment prospects, particularly in light of declines in agricultural production. 1 Photograph. ¶ Data obtained via group sessions with 160 high school & college students elicited beliefs about the life course, particularly the adulthood transition. The majority (93%) described the life course in terms of an age period approach, with infancy, childhood, adulthood, & old age commonly described as stages. Life span status differences emerged in the ages at which adolescents believed adulthood transition events would occur overall & for the average woman vs the average man: college students described older ages of occurrence for leaving home, beginning full-time employment, marriage, & parenthood than did high school students. For all, however, marriage & parenthood were thought to occur at significantly younger ages for the average woman than for the average man. Findings are discussed in terms of the implicit life course theories that adolescents bring to the adulthood transition. 3 Tables, 1 Figure. Adapted from the source document.

Hobart, Charles (Dept Sociology U Alberta, Edmonton T6G 2E1), How They Handle It: Young Canadians, Sex, and AIDS, UI Youth and Society, 1992, 23, 4, June, 411-433.

¶ Sexual behaviors & attitudes toward sex & AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) were investigated among a sample of 1,775 Anglophone & 493 Francophone Canadian postsecondary students who completed questionnaires on their concerns about 4 sexually-transmitted diseases (STDs) & their expectations about condom usage with different types of partners (steady, casual, etc). Regression analyses by gender, ethnicity, & region on 30 indicators revealed that only 9 indicators were significantly predictive of concern about STDs for any ethnicity X sex (ethsex) grouping. Women's patterns predicted better than men's, but the patterns between variables were not consistent, nor were there any strong predictors. The most powerful predictors of concern were size of home community & romantic love beliefs among Francophone women. In terms of expectations about condom use, the basic sociological predictors of family background, personal, & psychological characteristics, reference groups, & nonsexual relationships were minimally influential. The best predictor of condom use for the 4 ethsex groups was the number of sexual partners, with the most sexually experienced students expecting to use condoms the least. 6 Tables, 18 References. M. ¶ Empirical data collected by the German Youth Instit are drawn on to examine gender differences in young people's attitudes toward starting work in both the Federal Republic & the former German Democratic Republic. Results indicate that both young men & women accept that employment requiring certain qualifications & training is a normative part of their life plans. Girls, however, tend to choose jobs traditionally viewed as "women's work" without a full appreciation of the disadvantages inherent in such jobs; they also seem unaware of the conflict involved in trying to balance a family & career. ¶ A normative sample of 207 children in grades 3-6 in urban Minneapolis, Minn, was administered a descriptive matching instrument--the Revised Class Play (RCP)--to explore the predictive significance of peer reputation in elementary school for the quality of adaptation in adolescence. Each S received 3 scores (sociability-leadership, aggression-disruption, & sensitivity-isolation). At 7-year follow-up, 88% of these Ss & their parents completed questionnaires utilizing a broad range of adolescent outcome measures (eg, social & athletic competence, academic performance, behavioral symptoms, well-being). The 3 RCP scores were significantly related to both adolescent competence & psychopathology, supporting the predictive validity of the RCP as well as the continuity of general adaptation. Each dimension of peer reputation had a different pattern of prediction depending on the outcome criteria under consideration, suggesting the importance of a multidimensional approach to peer reputation. Results suggested somewhat different patterns of prediction for boys & girls, especially for the sensitive-isolated dimension. 4 Tables, 48 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Observational demographic, educational, & employment data are used to examine the transition from school to work among 37 Indian students in South Africa over a 4-year period spanning their attendance at coeducational secondary schools & subsequent departure from school. Occupational choice was found to be determined mainly by opportunities in society. Though the students expressed dissatisfaction with school & employment prospects, generally they were prepared to adjust to existing circumstances. Structural conditions & cultural interpretations & practices appear to explain why social status generally remained unaltered after the securing of paid employment. Dependent variables include psychosomatic disorders, psychosocial stress symptoms, & delinquency. The overall levels for stress & delinquency are found to be higher in West Germany. ¶ The relationships among truancy, drug use, & knowledge about AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) were investigated through questionnaire data from 932 British teenagers from nonmetropolitan urban areas of southern England. Social characteristics (gender, age, family traits), incidence of substance & drug abuse, other problem behaviors (truancy, smoking, fighting), & accurate AIDS information were analyzed. Truancy was correlated with negative social characteristics & smoking parents. Truants acting together as a group were involved in other problem behaviors. Although truants admitted experimenting with drugs & solvents 3-4 times more often than nontruants, the majority were not regular users. Finally, truants were less generally informed or concerned than other students about the risks of HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) infection. More aggressive AIDS education aimed at truants is recommended. 5 Tables, 49 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Since the 1970s, a very flexible system of vocational training has developed in Germany that can react both qualitatively & quantitatively to changes in the training market. It is composed of a wide range of full-time, school-based training, preparatory training, & supplemental instruction, often supported by the statutory authorities through local or federal government programs run by private organizations, adult education sponsors, or self-help groups. Unexpected demand for further education opportunities has created a marked differentiation among vocational occupations & a change in school selection procedures; as a result, there is a growing group of young people at the bottom of the training hierarchy who are experiencing problems making the transition from school to work. Data from a longitudinal study by the German Youth Instit are reported, & a plea is made for the inclusion of a sociopedagogical component in vocational training designed to assist youth during this transition. 17 References. ¶ Gender & social class differences in self-reported illness among young people in Finland are examined, & an attempt is made to determine whether the relationship between social class & limiting long-standing illness is similar among young men & women. From the 1986 nationwide Level of Living Survey, interview data were obtained pertaining to respondents ages 15-24 (N = 2,238). Findings reveal that: young women reported a limiting long-standing illness more often than young men; the prevalence of limiting long-standing illness increased with age; virtually no relationship existed between social class & limiting long-standing illness, even when various measures of social class were used; & controlling the impact of several background variables in the logistic regression analysis had no statistical significance. 3 Tables, 42 References. ¶ An investigation of sexuality-laden socialization processes aimed at adolescent females, drawing on data obtained during interviews of 50 advantaged & disadvantaged girls in Israel. Results demonstrate that disadvantaged girls encounter conservative conceptions of sexuality at home & from peers, & progressive ideals at school; conversely, advantaged girls are presented with progressive notions of sexuality at home & from peers, & conservative standards at school. Implications for theories of social reproduction that attempt to explain socialization practices & experiences without accounting for institutional & class-based differences are discussed. 1 Appendix, 49 References. ¶ A literature review of 10 empirical & 6 theoretical studies published 1989-1991 on communication of adolescents with parents & peers reveals a broad range of theoretical approaches & topics, but the hypotheses are generally weak. ¶ An analysis of the relationship between athletic participation & the subjective self-identities of high school students, based on longitudinal data from the High School & Beyond Survey (1980 & 1982 waves), focusing on the dependent variables of self-esteem, internal locus of control, & extracurricular involvement other than sports. The findings show discernible shifts between the sophomore & senior years with respect to the student roles of scholar & athlete, especially a decline in the proportion of pure athletes & an increase of students in nonscholar-nonathlete roles. These changes are interpreted as reflecting an emphasis on the increased skill level of athletes as they move up the ladder of interscholastic competition. The data show that students who are able to maintain a combined identity of both scholar & athlete are characterized by high scores on self-esteem, active extracurricular involvement in areas other than sport, an internal locus of control, & assimilation of the conventional values of high school. It is likely that the differences between the scholar-athletes & other students were established prior to the high school years. Therefore, the findings probably reflect a process of selection into athletics & of selectivity with respect to continuation in athletics between the sophomore & senior years. 3 Tables, 2 Figures, 9 References. ¶ In light of contemporary concerns in Western societies about the demise of the Protestant work ethic, a Likert-type scale was developed to assess work orientation, ascetism, & "fun/morality." Results of administration of the scales & a biographical inventory to 1,000 undergraduates at Randse Afrikaanse U (Johannesburg, Republic of South Africa) reveal that respondents still score higher on the work ethic scales than on the fun/morality ones, though these values do not always correspond with behavior. ¶ Communication difficulties that older adolescents felt they had experienced with their parents are explored via questionnaire data collected from 188 undergraduates at a large southwestern US university. Also considered is whether communication problems or the perceived qualities of the problems are associated with relational satisfaction. Results indicate that the most frequent type of current communication problem involved personal criticism. Past problems were more likely to focus on parent-adolescent tensions related to behavioral restriction. Few significant differences existed between very satisfied & dissatisfied adolescents in terms of the types of difficulties reported. However, older adolescents' attributions for their past & present communication problems significantly predicted their current satisfaction. It is noted that the specific type of problem experienced by adolescents may contribute substantially less to their satisfaction with parents than the ways they interpret the problems. 3 Tables, 54 References. ¶ Factors such as gender, age, self-concept, behavioral adjustment, & prior relocation experiences were considered in an exploration of adolescent coping strategies during family relocation abroad, based on scale & inventory data from 39 US teenagers & their families who had just moved to Belgium. Parents completed the Background Information Data Sheet & the Stress Response Scale, while the children answered the Coping Responses Inventory-Youth Form & the Piers-Harris Children's Self-Concept Scale. It was found that both approach & avoidance strategies were adopted in equal proportions, but correlational analyses indicated that teenage girls & older teenagers were more likely to adopt approach strategies. Better behavioral adjustment & self-concept were associated with fewer avoidance strategies, & more approach strategies, but prior relocation was irrelevant. 2 Tables, 44 References. ¶ Two cohorts of mainly minority inner-city teenage girls admitted to the Teen Health Family Planning Clinic in Houston, Tex, were surveyed in 1986 (N = 205) & 1989 (N = 510) for their knowledge & beliefs concerning risk factors for HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) infection. Based on responses to the Knowledge & Attitude Scale, correlations between ethnic origin & AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) knowledge were evaluated. The cohorts' basic knowledge about AIDS was similar, despite a large majority of the 1989 group's attendance in AIDS education classes. Level of sexual activity & number of partners increased in the 3-year period, yet there were fewer concerns about acquiring HIV infection. Caucasian girls had twice as many partners as blacks, & 4 times more than Hispanics. More promiscuous teens were also more aware & concerned about AIDS. 2 Tables, 17 References. ¶ Questionnaire data from the seventh wave of a longitudinal study of school-leavers in South Australia that commenced in 1980, when 554 respondents were ages 15-17, are drawn on to compare 4 groups: satisfied employed, dissatisfied employed, unemployed, & full-time tertiary students. The groups differed initially with respect to only 1 background variable, teacher-rated academic potential, & did not differ on any of the psychological measures of well-being. In general, the unemployed & dissatisfied employed groups displayed poorer psychological well-being than the 2 other groups on a range of measures; this is attributed, however, to the fact that the 2 disadvantaged groups showed smaller improvements than the others, rather than any deterioration. Results also suggest that, for males, unemployment was worse than unsatisfactory employment, while for females, the reverse was true. 2 Tables, 47 References. Adapted from the source document.

Here, the success & failure of these mediated channels in facilitating the searching, matching, & interacting processes that bring singles together are explored, drawing on data from previous research, & it is demonstrated how these pathways to romance not only facilitate meeting eligible others, but also shape singles' understanding of their romantic relationships. 75 References. ¶ An investigation of sexual & alcohol/drug use behaviors associated with sexually transmitted diseases (STDs), drawing on data collected during in-home interviews from a probability sample of 968 adults in the San Francisco Bay Area, Calif. Analysis reveals that problem drinking or alcohol dependence is a primary risk factor independent of other factors. Female (F) problem drinkers are 4.5 times more likely to contract STDs than other Fs, regardless of other risk factors. For men, a history of multiple partners & a lifetime of drinking problems are associated with STDs, although alcohol dependence is again a key risk factor independent of others. A number of behaviors typical of problem drinking predispose Ss to multiple sexual pairings, & thus to increased risk of STDs. 6 Tables, 45 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Two of the largest & most widely cited studies on rape (publication information not provided) suggest a prevalence rate so high that almost 50% of all women would be victims of rape or attempted rape an average of twice in their lives. An analysis of these studies reveals a number of flaws that raise serious questions about their credibility. These studies are seen as highly sophisticated examples of advocacy research, which employs elaborate methods under the guise of social science investigation to persuade the public & policymakers that a problem is vastly larger than commonly recognized. In particular, these studies: (1) define the problem of rape so broadly that it includes as victims a large proportion of women who do not think they were raped & continued to have sexual relations with the men who, according to the researchers' definition, raped them; (2) measure a group highly impacted with the problem & then project the findings to society-at-large; & (3) assert that a variety of smaller studies & reports with different problem definitions, methodologies of diverse quality, & varying results form a cumulative block of evidence in support of advocacy findings. AA

¶ The relationship between venereal disease (VD), prostitution, & the early days of the mainland China medical community is analyzed from the mid-1800s to before the 1949 communist takeover. Western-style medicine arrived in China via missionaries, who brought a moral message about the complementary social evils, VD & prostitution. But Western medicine, without the central, continual support of an administrative state, was unable to meet China's health care requirements. Before the revolution, VD was a major public health problem, though there was no stigma for being infected as there was in the West, & prostitution was more tolerated. Since the Western & Western-trained medical community was small, they could not establish their version of homeopathic medicine. 3 Tables. Adapted from the source document.

Over 60% of the respondents (Rs) approved of premarital sexual intercourse between partners in love or engaged, with no significant gender difference in sexual permissiveness. However, most Rs had engaged only in kissing, necking, & petting, not in sexual intercourse. M Rs were found to be less experienced than F Rs. Sexual permissiveness & experience were related to level of acculturation; Rs who dated only Caucasians were more sexually experienced than those who dated only Chinese. ¶ A standardized test of sexual knowledge, attitudes, & values was completed by 213 inner-city male adolescent sex offenders during an initial assessment & after participation in a 40-week group treatment program, during which 4 weekly group sessions were devoted to sex education. There was a large attrition rate: only 127 Ss entered treatment, & of those, only 52 completed 70%+ of the group treatment sessions. Results indicate that Ss who completed the entire program, including pre- & posttests (N = 45), significantly shifted their sexual attitudes & values, though improvements in the knowledge portion of the test were statistically reliable only for Ss who completed all items. It is concluded that a 4-session sex education program may be too short for this population, & underscore the importance of attention to individual differences in experience & capacity when assessing sexual knowledge. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 10 References. ¶ Structured questionnaire & scale data are drawn on to investigate risk-taking behavior among 140 intravenous drug users (IVDUs) in Athens, Greece, in an attempt to identify possible factors accounting for the low HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) seroprevalence rate in this population. High-risk drug using & sexual practices were reported by the majority of respondents (Rs). Awareness of the risk of HIV infection was low, but 33% claimed to have changed risk behaviors in both drug use & sexual practices after the appearance of AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome). Several drug use, mental health, criminal behavior, & sociodemographic factors were correlated with high risk behavior & reported change. It is concluded that low HIV seroprevalence is due to delayed invasion of the virus & not to the behavior of IVDUs. 7 Tables, 26 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Four themes in sociobiological literature are relevant to the sociology of the family: (1) the influence of primary social structures on the evolution of hominids; (2) the significance of family structures for the development of social cooperation, as well as social order; (3) the rise of different kinship systems & their relationship to different optimal reproductive strategies; & (4) the explanation of family processes in contemporary societies. While sociobiological theory has led to substantial progress in sociological explanations relative to the first two areas, & has made decisive contributions to solving the question of the universality of the family, cultural anthropology & theories of rational decision-making offer more explanatory power regarding the last two themes. Sociobiology's contribution has been most useful in showing the necessity for developing theoretical perspectives that explain changes in family structures. 36 References. ¶ Sociodemographic & lifestyle characteristics, sexual & drug use behaviors, & knowledge about HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) infection were collected via interview from a convenience sample of 211 male street prostitutes & 15 male customers in New Orleans, La. Data indicate that despite knowledge of HIV infection & its transmission, customers engage in high-risk sexual & drug use behaviors with prostitutes. Because there is a high HIV infection rate among the male prostitutes, & because their customers primarily describe themselves as bisexual or heterosexual, it is likely that such customers serve as a vector of transmission of HIV infection to their other partners, including the heterosexual population. 14 References. ¶ The challenge that male transsexualism presents to psychoanalytic theory is explored. R. J. Stoller's ideas (eg, The Transsexual Experiment, London: Hogarth Press, 1975) & the criticisms they have provoked have helped to contextualize the issue, but current theory about the nature of transsexualism & clinical methods for dealing with transsexual patients are subject to debate. Vignettes of two transsexuals are presented to provide a basis for understanding the decision-making process in which transsexuals are deeply engaged. Several common features are identified, & an attempt is made to reconstruct the patients' pasts, emphasizing narcissism & a hatred of things masculine. Rather than generate a theory of "true" & "false" transsexualism, it is argued that the goal of psychoanalysis in this area should be to identify & use different approaches to assist patients undergoing a sex change. 29 References. Patkar, Priti, Girl Child in Red Light Areas, UM The Indian Journal of Social Work, 1991, 52, 1, Jan, 71-80.
¶ The Indian social system has traditionally considered prostitution as a necessary social evil, but the society's failure to provide any kind of care for prostitutes' children has resulted in a growing number of female children who are driven to destitution & ploughed back into the profession. Field experience is drawn on to describe the miserable plight of such girls in the red light area of Kamathipura, Bombay. The need to initiate social work intervention is emphasized. ¶ India has sought to abolish the traffic in persons for the purpose of prostitution, not to abolish prostitution itself, though the Immoral Traffic (Prevention) Act (ITPA), 1956, & several state acts. Despite these efforts, sexual exploitation or abuse of females, including children, has continued to grow at an alarming rate. Official statistics & figures provided by the media are examined & compared, revealing that ITPA enforcement leaves much to be desired. Recent amendments to the ITPA have had little impact on the growing phenomenon of sexual exploitation. 4 Tables, 28 References. Adapted from the source document. Pollack, David H., Forced out of the Closet: Sexual Orientation and the Legal Dilemma of "Outing", UM University of Miami Law Review, 1992, 46, 3, Jan, 711-750.
¶ An overview of legal & ethical issues presented by the movement to "out" or expose closeted celebrities & public officials who are homosexual. The origins & rationale for the outing movement are discussed in light of changing attitudes toward homosexuality in the US since the 1960s. Arguments made by proponents & opponents of outing are reviewed, & issues surrounding the right to privacy are considered; the "newsworthiness" privelege is also addressed, along with its limitations. The existence of moral principles making outing an ethically indefensible political strategy is considered within the overall debate of whether sexuality is a public or private matter. K. ¶ Questionnaire & interview data from a cross-sectional life-span sample of 117 women ages 26-78 in Baltimore, Md, are drawn on to explore the association among sexual daydreaming & sexual attitudes & activity. A factor analysis & varimax rotation of the sexual history variables, age, & the sexual daydream scale data revealed three primary factors representing dimensions of sexual activity & drive, attitudes toward sexual activity, & sexual satisfaction. Age was associated with less sexual daydreaming, drive, & activity, & more negative sexual attitudes. Sexual daydreaming varied directly with sexual drive & sexual activity & with a positive sexual attitude. 5 Tables, 2 Figures, 33 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Discussed is an innovative approach for the treatment of complex sexual disorders. Sexoanalysis integrates current knowledge on sexual/erotic development pathology within a psychodynamic framework to help patients gain insight on the secondary gains, anxieties, & intrapsychic issues that underlie their sexual problem. The treatment process focuses on the analysis of sexual fantasies & the modification of maladaptive erotic imagery. Following a brief overview of sexoanalytic theory, a clinical case study is presented to demonstrate how sexoanalysis can resolve sexual disorders, improve sexual/erotic functioning, & promote sexual maturity. 1 Figure, 1 Appendix, 18 References. (GER)

¶ To examine the role of sexual infidelity as a factor causing the breakup of romantic relationships, questionnaire data were obtained from 101 female & 53 male Austrians ages 20-60 who had left a relationship; interview data were also obtained from a subsample of 55 respondents. Results show that in 60 instances, 1 partner had been unfaithful, while in 24 instances, both had been unfaithful. About 37% of the men & 34% of the women had been unfaithful in some way. No differences were observed between cohabitating & married couples. About 21% were already involved in a new relationship when separation from the former relationship began. Four primary forms of infidelity are distinguished: (1) infidelity as a lifestyle; (2) situational, spontaneous infidelity; (3) infidelity as a consequence of dissatisfaction with one's partner; & (4) long-term love affairs. In general, the public is becoming more relaxed about infidelity. 3 Tables, 11 References. M. Meeks

¶ Interview data collected 1984/85 from 706 Mexican-American & 317 Anglo-American females ages 13-19 living in Los Angeles, Calif, were analyzed using survival analysis to examine whether socioeconomic or subcultural factors account for observed ethnic differences concerning first premarital intercourse. Inter- & intragroup analyses supported the model of subcultural values: ethnic differences in socioeconomic circumstances alone do not account for the observed ethnic differences in the incidence of first premarital intercourse; however, cultural differences relating to premarital sexual activity do partially account for this gap. 4 Tables, 38 References. Here, analysis of data from the 1988/89 General Social Surveys (N = 340 US divorced people) indicates a much lower level of sexual activity than found in past research. Regression analyses find that both number of partners & sex frequency are related to religiosity, education, & political liberality. ¶ The evolution of the US military's policy of excluding homosexuals from service is traced, focusing on ways that political & legal developments have shaped it over the past ten years. The military's justifications for the policy are reviewed, & it is concluded that in practice, the policy impedes military functioning without achieving its stated purpose. Legal challenges to the exclusionary policy are reported, demonstrating that the federal courts remain relatively powerless in assisting homosexuals banned from service. It is suggested that the Dept of Defense allow homosexuals the opportunity to serve in peacetime, not just use them as needed during crisis situations. 1 Table. K. Hyatt

¶ After reviewing theories that rape represents either a specific manifestation or a side-effect of a more general psychological adaptation by males (Ms), six hypotheses are tested against currently available data from laboratory research & historical evidence on human sexual behavior: (1) both coercive & noncoercive sex are associated with high levels of M sexual arousal & performance; (2) achieving physical control of a sexually unwilling female (F) is arousing to Ms; (3) young Ms are more sexually coercive than older Ms; (4) Ms of low socioeconomic status (SES) are more sexually coercive; (5) motivation to use sexual coercion is influenced by a M's perception of its effects on his social image; & (6) Ms will be motivated, even in long-term relationships, to use coercion in response to a F partner's lack of response or resistance to sex, interpreting these as signs of infidelity. The data support all six hypotheses, consistent with the rape-specific theory, but also support the side-effect theory. ¶ To examine issues of casual sex & sexual experience in Norway, anonymous self-administered questionnaire data were obtained in 1989 from a representative sample of 2,997 Norwegians, ages 17-19. Results showed that, to a large extent, experience of casual sex was a function of the time the individual had been coitally active. The amount of sexual experience was poorly related to social background & strongly related to lifestyle factors, eg, smoking & drinking of alcohol. Only a small minority engaged in casual sex behaviors that could place them at risk of sexually transmitted diseases. Interestingly, this minority had the identifying characteristic of low self-reported intimacy with their first coital partner. 9 Tables, 1 Figure, 47 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Extending previous work by R. W. Connell et al (see SA 39:1/91X3191), four social correlates of unsafe sexual intercourse among gay, bisexuals, & heterosexuals are examined: (1) alcohol consumption; (2) uncertainty about one's HIV (human immunodeficiency virus)-infection status; (3) learned & shared logic about condoms; & (4) logic about the seriousness of the acquired immune deficiency syndrome epidemic. Qualitative & quantitative data collected via questionnaire, interview, & ethnographic fieldwork from 2 of sexually active people in the gay community & health clinic clients in Perth, Australia (total N = 906) indicate that unsafe sexual intercourse can be considered a collective, cultural institution & not merely due to individual ignorance, weakness, or foolishness. Thus, HIV education & prevention programs need to focus more on collective action to achieve safer sex practices & on grass-roots social processes that will sustain changes toward safer sex. 4 Figures, 20 References. ¶ Social policy treats men as individuals, but women as members of a family. Such government policies add to gendered individual life courses. The life course of women–more than that of men–is distinguished by the mutual influence of power relations within & outside the family. To give justice to the complex lives of women, quantitative empirical social research needs to adopt a relational approach, an approach that also captures the influence of family dynamics on life changes. Some examples–taken from the area of West German social pension legislation & pension outcomes–are provided, all of which show that relational approaches indeed help to understand the discrimination women still face within & outside the family. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 24 References. Socialization practices begin early in a child's life, & the F child is already at a disadvantage due to the tradition of overindulging the male at the cost of the F. The data also show a discernible relationship between the nature of the parental occupation, the ecocultural milieu, & the specific aspects of the child's socialization. ¶ The cross-cultural family therapy literature perpetuates a negative & oversimplified stereotype of the Chinese family. Extremely patriarchal, conservative patterns of behavior are said to lead to poor communication, tensions, bitterness, & psychological problems. Three years of fieldwork living in extremely traditional Chinese households reveals that southern Chinese fishing families practice a different ideal of behavior, allowing good communication & flexible interpersonal behavior. Chinese families can draw on their own traditions for good models, rather than adopting Western models of family behavior, as some family therapists advise. 47 References. ¶ Mailed questionnaire data from 125 fathers granted a divorce 1986-1990 in Roanoke County, Va, are used to explore factors associated with variables related to custody, visitation, & child support. Survey questions fell into 1 of 5 categories: children, circumstances surrounding the divorce, relationship with the former spouse, economic variables, & background variables. In an exploratory analysis, stepwise multiple regression was used to develop a subset of independent variables that were useful in predicting the following dependent variables: custody satisfaction, visitation frequency, visitation quality, child support paid, & satisfaction with child support. Baxter, Janeen (Dept Anthropology & Sociology U Queensland, 4072 Australia), Power Attitudes and Time: The Domestic Division of Labour, UM Journal of Comparative Family Studies, 1992, 23, 2, summer, 165-182.

¶ Data from a 1986 national survey of 831 married employed workers in Australia are used to examine factors associated with men's & women's participation in child care & housework. Three key themes–marital power, sex-role attitudes, & time constraints–are examined. Results suggest that the domestic division of labor (DofL) is primarily a gender DofL, & that women devote much more time to domestic work. Paid work time & sex-role attitudes have stronger effects on men's involvement in housework, although evidence suggests that women's time in paid work leads to a reduction in the amount of time they devote to housework. Support is also found for the impact of men's & women's relative contribution to the household income on the domestic DofL. It is concluded that women's movement into paid work will affect the DofL only insofar as it increases women's economic power & encourages men to take a more liberal view of sex roles. 4 Tables, 42 References. ¶ An examination of the widespread shift toward the giving of groomprice (as distinct from dowry) in Kerala, India, over the past two decades finds that change in the marriage market effected by both demographic & sociocultural developments is the chief cause. The rapid population growth of the 1950s & 1960s led to a shortage of available grooms of appropriate age, & the large-scale acceptance of the importance of individual achieved status led to a shortage of grooms by educational & employment criteria. Giving & accepting groomprice has been a predictable response to these changing market forces. The shift to groomprice in Kerala will probably not cause the type of antifemale practices characteristic of northern India. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The extent to which people in remarriages have attributes that adversely influence marital quality & stability is examined using telephone interview data from a national sample of 2,033 married persons. Five models linking remarriage-induced attributes to an increased probability of a decline in marital quality & divorce are evaluated. Persons in remarriages are more likely to be: poorly integrated with parents & in-laws, willing to leave the marriage, poor marriage material, of lower socioeconomic status, & in age-heterogeneous marriages. All factors but socioeconomic status explain declines in marital quality & higher levels of marital instability. Together, the remaining four models explain major portions of the remarriage/marital-quality & remarriage/divorce relationships. 3 Tables, 22 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A review of literature on the Maoris (who comprise 10+% of New Zealand's population), supplemented with limited interview data (N not given), shows that as difficult economic times & poverty have set in, the Maoris have tended to return to extended family patterns. A history of the Maoris since their arrival in New Zealand in the tenth century is presented, & their employment, education, & housing are discussed. This tribal group has renewed its efforts to assist its people to improve their socioeconomic class & rebuild their culture, but little progress has been made, due in large part to the changing structure of the home & of values. While Maori health has improved, it is still inferior to that of the white culture. The prominent role of Maori women in promoting networks of community health workers for grass-roots community development & support, establishing resource centers, setting up groups to discuss health issues, & establishing housing programs, is noted. 6 References. ¶ In the context of the current argument that the family is in a state of decline, the relationship between social intervention & family imagery is discussed. Popular themes regarding family life are criticized as basically asocial & insensitive. ¶ It is contended that important relational changes in the family system during the second half of the first year of life are brought about when children begin to walk. Analysis of interviews conducted with 62 parents of 8-month-old infants classified according to locomotor experience, reveals that an increase in parents' expression of affection to their children at the onset of crawling was balanced by an increase in the use of vocal prohibitions, & higher incidence of expressions of anger & initial use of physical punishment. ¶ Changes in patterns of marriage & household formation among Malays, Chinese, & Indians are investigated, drawing on 1981/82 surveys conducted with 2,310 married women in rural & urban settings, & comparing results to previous surveys & population census data collected since 1947. Aspects covered include social mixing before marriage, choice of spouse, spouse characteristics, & place of residence after marriage. Analysis reveals important cultural differences between the main Malaysian ethnic groups in matters related to marriage, though in many respects, attitudes & practice are tending to converge. For each ethnic group, however, the timing of marriage still differs. Education is clearly a major influence, but other factors such as degree of freedom in the choice of spouse, age of spouses at the time of marriage, & the prospective place of residence after marriage also have an independent influence. 12 Tables, 4 Figures, 1 Glossary, 19 References. Results of study 1 indicated a less positive perception of stepfathers carrying out a disciplinary role than of fathers. In study 2, however, stepfathers were generally not perceived less positively than fathers, although their expressions of affection (eg, hugging & kissing) were seen as more likely to make their stepchildren feel uncomfortable. While substantial convergence existed in male (M) & female (F) adjustment to divorce, moderate differences were found in lifestyle, attitude toward married life, & life after divorce. Fs tended to perceive more disagreement with their ex-spouses on finances, domestic duties, & sex roles. Fs were more likely than Ms to: cite drug, alcohol, & physical abuse problems as sources of dissatisfaction; & be dissatisfied with the marital fidelity of their ex-spouse, though, overall, no significant difference was found for interpersonal trust & fidelity. Several different dimensions of support & life-course factors of the parent & the child that are related to receipt of support are explored. ¶ Government population register data on a complex family system–the stem family households of early modern (1670-1870) Japan–are presented to argue that for elderly women, each of the potential relationships–with spouse, adult children, & grandchildren–has an independent effect on mortality. In addition, the effect is dependent on the character of the relationships, not just their number, & originates not only from receiving support from others but also from providing it to them. It is concluded that the family is an institution that enhances health by providing opportunities for individuals to exert a sense of control. 2 Tables, 18 References. ¶ The individual characteristics & environmental factors that comprise the framework within which individuals & couples make family-related decisions are investigated, based on 1983 survey data from 22,401 nonsingle Italian women ages 15-64. Particular focus is on how & when union dissolution appears in the life cycle of an Italian woman through a legal or de facto separation. Reflecting conclusions reached in other Western countries, the findings reveal greater hazards of dissolution among women who: were born in more recent decades, are of high social status (education or occupation), marry at a young age, have cohabited prior to marriage, have no more than 2 children of under age 15, & reside in a northern Italian urban area. It is suggested that the scarcity of the diffusion of the model corresponding to a high divorce rate in Italy can be explained in part by the time it is taking for even the most basic aspects of the changing status of women to manifest themselves. However, these same aspects of women's status have not stopped the development in Italy of fertility models (0-1 child per family) that contrast with the traditional image of the family. The limited tendency of Italian women to dissolve conjugal unions stems primarily from the Catholic vision of marriage. Further, difficulties with respect to work & housing, in addition to the economic value of a stable family in Italy, represent a considerable obstacle to a woman's desire to achieve a separation. 10 Tables, 19 References. ¶ To investigate the educational attainment of children of working, unemployed, & handicapped fathers in the Netherlands, secondary analysis is performed on data from 2 previous studies: Hannie te Grotenhuis's Children Are the Losers: Second-Generation Effects of Unemployment and Disability (see SA 38:6/90S22549/ISA/1990/6231), using questionnaire data from a cohort of 19,290 students entering secondary school in 1989; & Hannie te Grotenhuis's & J. Dronkers's "Enkele gevolgen van werkloosheid en arbeidsongeschiktheid in de verzorgingsstaat; ongelijke onderwijskansen van kinderen" ([Some Consequences of Unemployment and Disability in the Welfare State; Unequal Educational Opportunities for Children] see SA 38:4/90V7753), using a 1977 cohort of 22,000 children. A comparision of the two studies shows changes in the effects of unemployment & handicaps during the 1980s. Paternal unemployment or disability had almost no negative consequences for the educational opportunities of the younger generation in 1989, despite decreases in welfare payments. In Commentaar op Dronkers (Commentary on Dronkers), te Grotenhuis notes that Dronkers did not distinguish between the effects of short- & long-term unemployment. In Minder drama, meer analyse (Less Drama, More Analysis), Dronkers denies that he should have found any relationship between fathers' occupational history & children's success in school. 5 Tables, 19 References. ¶ In contrast to the situation in many other countries, wages in the Netherlands are sufficiently high that one worker can support a whole family reasonably well. Thus, Dutch women can choose to combine family & career responsibilities or devote full-time care to family & home. Women's participation in the labor market, although steadily rising, is considerably lower than in other Western European countries. Considering the generous social welfare benefits of the Netherlands, one could say that with the exception of a few self-supporting women, most Dutch women are dependent for their income on their husbands or the government. Problems of such dependency are discussed. M. Meeks

After controlling for socioeconomic status & time since divorce, black parents were more satisfied with parenthood than were whites, black females (Fs) were less likely than white Fs to report that someone in the home had a substance abuse problem, & black males were more likely than other groups to be satisfied with their work both in & out of the home. No significant differences in depression, health, life satisfaction, & quality of life since separation were found. 2 Tables, 32 References. Adapted from the source document.

Results indicate that for mothers who remarry within 5 years of divorce, child support payments have no adverse impact on remarriage. However, mothers receiving child support & those with above-average amounts of child support are less likely to remarry 5+ years after divorce. Findings confirm previous evidence of a mild negative effect of child support on remarriage. 3 Tables, 19 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Drawing from G. Becker's cost-benefit model of marriage & divorce ("A Theory of Marriage Part II," Journal of Political Economy, 1974, 2, 2, S11-S26), the empirical effects of mental illness on divorce are analyzed. Becker's model, which posits that individuals determine whether benefits outweigh costs when considering marriage & divorce, is augmented when mental health is considered as a cost. Logistic regression analyses of survey data from a 1986 Epidemiological Catchment Area study (N = 738 never-married females [Fs], 466 married or once-married Fs, & 240 males [Ms]) in Baltimore, Md, are employed to test 4 hypotheses: mental illness in Ms decreases marriage rate & increases divorce rate; mental illness in Fs elicits these effects at a lower rate than in Ms; the presence of young children lowers divorce rate; & the impact of mental illness on divorce is lower when young children are present. Results support only some of these hypotheses; reasons for the variation are suggested. 3 Tables, 9 References. M. Maguire

Level of household income before separation had a significant & enduring impact on children's lives & was specifically associated with higher self-esteem & better sibling relations, while difference in income level before & after separation had no significant impact. Well-being did not differ significantly between children living in stepfamilies & those living with mothers alone, though children in single-parent families reported more congeniality in the home, more compatibility with siblings, & a better self-image. 1 Figure, 15 References. Further research is needed on positive parent-child interaction, which may be just as important as conflict processes in determining the development of conduct disorder. Theoretical & methodological issues surrounding the problem of determining causality from correlational research are raised, & the possibilities for naturalistic experimental studies discussed. 98 References. ¶ The incidence & types of, & characteristics of individuals involved in, cohabitation relationships are examined through analysis of data obtained through follow-up interview in 1991 of 1,500 Australian respondents, ages 27-44, previously interviewed in 1981. Rates of cohabitation varied with age group, but appeared to have reached a plateau in the 7%-8% range; 75% of de facto relationships had ended, but some had resulted in marriage. Age at commencement of cohabitation was generally 21-24, & women cohabited earlier than men. Cohabitants were more likely to have: left home earlier, been sexually active prior to age 18, had divorced parents, & adopted less traditional family values. They believed that cohabitation held economic advantages, involved less commitment, & allowed them to maintain individual independence. Commitment to partner & intention to formalize the relationship varied. 4 Tables, 12 References. D. Generoli (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ Single, employed women (N = 76) with a preschool-age child in 4 southern Calif cities completed a mail survey to explore factors associated with variations in single mothers' well-being (ie, depression & role strain) & perceptions of their child's behavior. Multiple regression analyses indicated that variables reflecting the interface between work & family roles (eg, beliefs about the consequences of maternal employment for children, perceived quality of child care) were important for both women's well-being & perceptions of children's behavior. Depression was more closely allied with the stability & resources in single mothers' lives; role strain, with the time & energy demands of work & the level of support available in the neighborhood. It is concluded that single women's perceptions of their children are associated with variables that reflect the larger ecology of their lives, including recency of single parenthood, the quality of their work life, & intersections between work & family roles. 2 Tables, 1 Appendix, 48 References. ¶ The incidence & effects of divorce late in life are examined through analysis of data taken from Current Population Reports, Marital Status & Living Arrangements, 1974-1988, & the 1988 National Survey of Families & Households (total N = 1,523). The proportion of elderly divorced over the past 15 years has increased with the proportion of divorced women outpacing that of divorced men. Reasons for this trend include gender differences in remarriage rates, greater divorce risk from debilitating illness & second or subsequent marriages, & greater acceptance of divorce as a viable alternative. Women, particularly younger women, were more likely than men to turn to others for emotional support during separation. Older women tended to turn to family or religious leaders for support. Women reported better adjustment & more happiness than men. 4 Tables, 1 Figure, 27 References. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

Extension of the Family Law Act would help to remedy the legal limbo, but granting de facto relationships legal equivalency to de jure marriage has been criticized as threatening the sanctity of marriage, & comprehensive efforts in this direction have not been successful. Piecemeal efforts to protect the property rights of de facto couples through referral of powers & cross-vesting has brought some relief, but a comprehensive constitutional amendment will likely be achieved only through public demand. 8 References. Longitudinal & cross-sectional panel data collected 1968-1980 suggest that remarriage by the custodial mother prompts sizable reductions in child support, but remarriage by the absent father has no appreciable effect. Child support increases modestly with the absent father's income, but absent fathers tend to pay considerably less than maximal equitable levels of child support. 1 Table, 35 References. ¶ The Canadian guaranteed annual income experiment with welfare recipients–called Mincome–included 8 groups with guaranteed income in negative income tax treatment programs & a control group with no guaranteed income (N not provided). Recipients were interviewed on a battery of demographic variables 3 times each year for 3 years. Microdata from Mincome are used to examine the effect of income transfers on family dissolution. A multivariate path model was used to assess the contribution of the length of marriage, male (M) household head educational level, & 3 treatment levels (high, medium & low generosity of income award) on female's (F's) literacy level, family income, family assets, M & F head employment, & marital dissolution. M head labor force participation & family size were negatively related to marital dissolution, while F head labor force participation & debt were positively related. Family income level had only an indirect influence on marital dissolution, mediated through M & F head employment & relative income of the two heads. Due to the apparent importance of the social roles of the partners within the family, welfare aid to families that allows the M head to achieve stable employment may be the preferred path to welfare reform. 3 Tables, 1 Diagram, 29 References. ¶ Data from a representative subsample of 2,653 parents from the 1987/88 National Survey of Families & Households are drawn on to investigate husbands' contributions to household labor in 4 types of families: first-married couples with biological children, remarried couples with biological children only, remarried couples with stepchildren only, & remarried couples with both biological & stepchildren. Absolute & relative contributions to total household labor did not differ significantly across family types, but husbands in remarried families contributed significantly more to five housework tasks. Multiple regression analysis confirmed that the influence of family type on the sharing of gender-typed housework is significant after controlling for the impact of relative resources, ideology, time availability, & household work load. It is concluded that the "incomplete institutionalization" of remarriage may contribute to a weakening of the gender-based segregation of household labor. 3 Tables, 32 References. Results reveal that while the experience of divorce does have a limited effect on the characteristics & functioning of friendship networks, the more important developmental experience is that of family conflict: higher levels of conflict appear to compromise network size & the affective qualities of friendship, & to heighten the experience of loneliness. ¶ Based on event-history data collected in 1984 for men & women born 1928-1965 (N not provided), the disruption of conjugal unions in the Netherlands is explored from a life-course perspective. The "weeding" hypothesis suggests that a couple who first test their relationship successfully by premarital cohabitation should be better equipped to deal with the build-up of possible tensions & therefore enjoy greater marital stability. A comparison with Sweden yields semiparametric evidence for both countries that contradicts the theoretically derived expectations (ie, disruption risks were lowest for marriages without prior cohabitation). The differential either remains (Sweden) or disappears (Netherlands) after controlling for a series of pertinent covariates, eg, social origin, & composition of the household of origin & of destination. In the Dutch data set, all three factors passed a statistical test of the proportionality assumption behind Cox survival regression models. A stratified & fully parametric analysis of the Dutch material is also performed, leading to different conclusions. The risk of union disruption according to these parametric outcomes is not the same for all modes of entry into union life, as is suggested by semiparametric analysis, but is clearly mode-specific. Evidence from a logistic specification of first union disruption risks in the Netherlands strongly supports weeding effects. 6 Tables, 3 Figures, 23 References. Adapted from the source document.

Levin, Irene & Trost, Jan, Women and the Concept of Family, Familjerapporter/Family Reports, 1992, 21, 5-39.

¶ Applying the perspective of the individual both as an individual & as a family member, the conceptualization of family, particularly by women, is explored. It is argued that the notion of combining parent-child & spousal or cohabitational dyadic units to clarify the meaning of various social constructs should be supplemented with a number of other dyadic units (eg, brother-brother, uncle-niece units) to reflect social reality, & that individuals can conceptualize family in their own way. The hypothesis that more females (Fs) than males (Ms) have large families & that they include more categories is tested using questionnaire data from 935 Swedish Ms & Fs ages 20-59. The findings reveal that: more Ms report having no family; more Ms have no children; & Fs report having more family members than do Ms. In a qualitative analysis of interview data obtained from a strategically drawn sample of 21 stepfamily households, Fs also demonstrate a great variety in terms of whom they include in their family. The differing criteria Fs use for inclusion (eg, blood ties, blood relatedness plus an emotional feeling, obligatory relationships) are discussed. The results indicate that rationalities of responsibility & caring are closely connected to a F's self, which varies from how traditional psychology has portrayed Fs. 8 Tables, 4 Figures, 19 References. ¶ Gender differences in work interruption are examined using a subsample of Canada's 1984 national Labor Force Survey (N not provided). It is argued that some differences can be attributed to the unequal effects of marriage & childrearing. Findings show that although women are more likely than men to experience work interruption, & for a longer duration, it affects women more adversely than men in terms of their likelihood to return to work, when taking into account differences in part-time & full-time work environments. Data confirm that marriage & childrearing explain a substantial part of job discontinuity for women but not for men. 7 Tables, 29 References. Adapted from the source document. Lin, Ruey-Lin, Perception of Family Background and Personal Characteristics among Indian College Students, UM Journal of American Indian Education, 1990, 29, 3, May, 19-28.

¶ Family socialization experiences shape the world perspective of the young along with their thinking & behavior. Here, questionnaire data are used to compare relationships between the perception of family background as either traditional (where discipline is emphasized) or modern (characterized by freer expression of affection) & academic performance among American Indian & white students (N not provided) at a predominantly white, midsize, state college in Mont in 1987, supplemented by data obtained at the Indian Career Service Center. Results show that despite the fact that they perceive more support & encouragement from their families, youngsters from better-educated families do not do as well academically as those from less-educated families. It is concluded that students from better-educated families do not spend as much time doing homework & are not willing to sacrifice to achieve preset goals. 6 Tables, 1 Appendix, 5 References. L. ¶ Traditionally, mental health services to children & their families were provided by public & private agencies that operated as a "mental health" system. New approaches attempt to integrate &/or coordinate the mental health system with the social welfare, juvenile justice, health, & special education systems to form a more unified children's service system. Inherent in these changes are expansion of the continuum of care to include new forms of intervention, the creation of new funding strategies, & a new role for parents. 1 Figure, 27 References. ¶ A comparative study of factors determining endogamy/exogamy among ethnic immigrant groups settling in Guatraché, a disadvantaged rural province of La Pampa, Argentina, focusing on the marriage patterns of Russian Germans, Spaniards, & Italians & their first-generation Argentinian progeny (total N = 1,734), 1910-1939. Census data show that all the ethnic groups & their offspring were endogamous to varying degrees: Italian & Spaniards intermarried somewhat more often, but Russian Germans remained socially isolated, with 90+% marrying among themselves. Although no significant effects were noted for social or occupational categories, the network of parental relations & proximity within the area were predictive of marital selection. 12 Tables. ¶ An attempt is made to include males (Ms) in research on physical child abuse by focusing on the motivational processes & social structures that differentiate Ms' abuse from that committed by females (Fs). It is argued that widespread gender imbalances in power, Ms' lack of role models & rewards for nurturant activity, & their socialization to violence bear a direct relationship to children's risk of physical abuse. The methodological problems involved in accurately comparing M & F caregivers' rates of physical child abuse are discussed, & a strategy for assessing these gender differences is introduced. 53 References. Marsiglio, William (U Florida, Gainesville 32611), Stepfathers with Minor Children Living at Home: Parenting Perceptions and Relationship Quality, Journal of Family Issues, 1992, 13, 2, June, 195-214.

¶ Stepfathers' perceptions about their stepfather role & the quality of their relationship with their oldest minor stepchild living at home are investigated in a sample of 195 stepfathers coresiding with a spouse or nonlegal partner, drawing on data from the 1987/88 National Survey of Families & Households. Results indicate that these stepfathers have diverse perceptions about different aspects of the stepfather role. Stepfathers who (1) live with both step- & biological children in the same households, (2) become a father figure to younger children, & (3) are happy with their marital/cohabitating partner are most likely to report "fatherlike" perceptions. These data do not support hypotheses that family structure variables & child's gender are significant predictors of stepfather-stepchild relationship quality. However, stepfathers who have more fatherlike perceptions, socialization values that emphasize conformity to external authority & obedience, & a wife/partner who has a positive relationship with her eldest child report a more positive relationship with their stepchildren. 3 Tables, 39 References. ¶ Gender differences in the behaviors of adults toward toddlers were noted by observing 794 families in 3 locales (zoo, amusement park, & children's theme park) near Sacramento, Calif. Chi-square analysis showed that there was little difference in the adults' behaviors across locations, but sex differences were seen at all sites. Fathers were more likely to push strollers when the toddler was in it, & to carry strollers, than were mothers, who more often pushed empty stollers. Toddlers in the stroller were more likely to be pushed by the same-sex parent. A larger % of male vs female toddlers were allowed to walk alone. Results support previous findings that adult males engage in more physical interaction with toddlers in public caretaking situations. 1 Table, 24 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Though it is an intuitively appealing metaphor for family response to structural barriers & stressful events, the concept of family adaptive strategies has been used as a sensitizing device, describing both macro- & microlevel trends & patterns of behavior. Specific methodological concerns are the appropriate level & unit of analysis & difficulties with operationalization. Conceptual difficulties include definition of strategy, the simultaneous treatment of strategies as a cause & an effect, & whether families themselves view their actions as strategies or whether the label comes from researchers. Theoretical models that can assist in the understanding of the family adaptive strategy construct include the structural, rational choice, & life course approaches. 102 References. ¶ Tremendous changes occurred in attitudes toward marriage in Italy in the last several decades. Even in highly conservative, patriarchal southern Italy, changes are taking place. The old system of attitudes, in which wives & daughters had no autonomy, remaining under the control of their husbands, fathers, & brothers, is giving way to a more egalitarian system. Attitudes toward premarital cohabitation & divorce are liberalizing. Additionally, the old double standard about conjugal infidelity is weakening. These changes can be seen through an analysis of popular drama productions. Special attention is given to the difference between Neapolitan & Sicilian cultures. M. Here, data obtained via 1986/87 semistructured interview from a random sample of 50 households in each of 4 villages in 3 districts of Rajasthan state, India, reveal that in 51% of families, Fs get married before the legal age of 11 years. Child marriage has become more or less a custom, but over the years its decline has been lower for Fs than for males. It remains more prevalent among cultivators & laborors, & has been a major cause of girls illiteracy or lower level of education. 5 Tables, 6 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ To investigate how the immigration process can bring about changes in family structure, questionnaire data were obtained from Yugoslav women immigrants (N = 155) in West Berlin, Germany. Significant shifts could be seen away from traditional patriarchal family relationships; eg, women attained a new sense of equality in dealing with their husbands. Most immigrant families only had one or two children & migration tended to strengthen marriage. To understand the current situation of these families, it is necessary to understand their original culture as well as the culture of the host country as influences in the decision to stay in Germany or return to Yugoslavia. 12 References. Adapted from the source document.

Reasons for this apparent shift to more violence against wives are discussed, & it is suggested that the transition from a culture of paternalism to one of untrammeled self-gratification was particularly important in creating a social environment in which wife beating was more common. ¶ The impact of marital separation or divorce on the individual is explored through a review of psychiatry, psychology, & social work literature. Coping with divorce is difficult despite individual differences or availability of resources. While women report more stress at initial separation, men report more stress during adjustment after divorce. Adoption of traditional sex roles during the marriage of children or continued contact with the ex-spouse may exacerbate the adjustment process further, though the presence of children may also create stability & enhance the adjustment process by enlarging the network of social contacts. Cognitive appraisal of the adjustment process as threatening, positive, or negative will affect coping & be influenced by temperament, expectations, & initiator status. 104 References. The most often cited reasons for divorce were dyadic cohesion, respondents' (Rs') feelings, dyadic communication, Rs' cognitions, former spouse's behavior, & Rs' behavior. Men reported fewer reasons for divorce than women. Former husbands reported proportionately more circumstantial reasons & dyadic conditions, & fewer individual reasons & dyadic behaviors than did their former wives. ¶ Among the large number of people in Bangladesh who have recently migrated from rural to urban areas are married men who leave behind their wives & children in native villages. Examined are the role of adjustment & the relationships of some selected variables with the adjustment of couples when either spouse is absent. Quantitative data were collected through a field survey; 264 husbands & wives who live apart were interviewed, & 51 letters written by wives to their husbands were analyzed. Findings differ significantly from studies of advanced industrial societies regarding the factors associated with adjustment of wives in the absence of their husbands. Also revealed is that factors associated with the adjustment of husbands & wives of Bangladesh during the absence of either are not the same. The variables of modernity values, marital adjustment, & monthly income are related to the adjustment of duolocal husbands, while frequency of home visits by husbands & number of years wives lived without the husbands are related to the adjustment of duolocal wives. The reason for such a difference could be the separate social worlds of husbands & wives of Bangladesh. Traditionally, husbands develop friendship & intimacy with men. Women, on the other hand, are confined within the boundaries of their husbands' families; they not only are prohibited from going out without the permission of the husbands but also may not even be allowed to talk to adult males who are not close kin. ¶ The importance of family & social networks among elderly Italians in Gippsland, Victoria, in southeastern Australia is examined via 1985/86 interview data from 227 Italian-born residents. Kinship support was highly valued & most frequently provided in the areas of advice, general information, emotional problems, & episodes of minor illness. The strength of these networks was based on the preservation of a cultural pattern that places a high value on the role of the extended family. Despite the widespread provision of formal community services designed to meet the needs of the aged, culture & language differences present barriers to the use of mainstream community services. ¶ In a critique of Virginia Young's analysis of West Indian kinship & domestic life (see SA 40:1/92Y4288), it is contended that her central argument that apparently dissimilar domestic practices in St. Vincent have several commonalities is hardly a new one. It is argued that her mode of investigation & analysis reflects simplistic explanations & contains logical, conceptual, & methodological errors. At the most general level of description & analysis, the model of stratification that she employs, which is based solely on gross economic indices, is inappropriate to its field of application or to her mode of inquiry. In addition, Young utilizes data from a nonrandom sample divided into female & couple-headed household categories, contrary to the normal practice in Caribbean household studies of dividing units into conjugal vs single-person households. It is concluded that Young's strategy represents a significant departure from established practice by cultural anthropologists working in the Caribbean & elsewhere. 13 References. S. ¶ A review of different perspectives on family studies, highlighting the psychoanalytical school & feminist critiques of the masculine origin of gendered concepts in children's development. Power- & violence-based analyses of family cohabitation & socialization are discussed, & examples of interclass & intergenerational characteristics of violence within Mexican farm family are presented that illustrate theoretical concepts elaborated by Pierre Bourdieu & the Frankfurt school (notably Max Horkheimer). ¶ Questionnaire data are drawn on to investigate the career & family role expectations & attitudes of 292 women university students in RI & both of their parents. Results indicate that most daughters & their parents are traditional in their attitudes toward mothering, hold somewhat egalitarian attitudes toward marital roles, & generally expect daughters to experience little frustration regarding future career & family roles. Differences & similarities among daughters, mothers, & fathers, as well as between intact & dissolved families of varying socioeconomic status, are also examined. 2 Tables, 1 Appendix, 40 References. ¶ A pilot study of dual-role stress & coping was conducted through examination of interview data from 45 women, 39 of whom completed 1-year follow-up mail questionnaires. The women, all working mothers with dependent children at home living in north London, England, were divided into 3 groups: (1) married & enjoying comparatively high income; (2) single with comparatively high income; & (3) single with comparatively low income. Though evidence of dual-role stress was found, many women obtained important benefits from work, & there was considerable evidence of good coping, especially in terms of drawing on the informal support of other women. Both the quality of the job & of domestic support were important for stress management. The relative poverty of organized child-care in GB was reflected in the child-care problem reported by most of these women: low income single women reported greatest levels of financial, child-care, & work stress. 10 Tables, 16 References. ¶ Marriage & migratory patterns of a large colony of Italians living in Rosario, Argentina, 1870-1914, are explored via census data, analyzing demographic structures & residential settlements for the immigrant group & the local population. A 1906 census showed that of Italian Rosarians, 39% were single men, & only 14% were single women, a disproportionate ratio that encouraged heterogeneous marriage. Only Aldean clansmen from southern Italy had a high rate of endogamy. This finding led to another analysis to quantitatively determine typical southern Italian marriage patterns, eg, between Piedmontese & Sicilians, which revealed that intraregional marriage patterns were more common than those occurring across regional boundaries. Such patterns are better understood in light of previously established, & currently evolving, social networks. 6 Tables, 2 Figures. Adapted from the source document as translated by J. Sadler.

¶ A review of the latest psychotherapeutic trends in treating the family as an institution suggests that a number of strategies used by Krishna, the King of Dwarika, to intervene between Arjuna & his cousins, the Kauravas, during Mahabharat, a war that occurred in India 4,000 years ago, are now being applied to help couples & families suffering feelings of hostility & interpersonal conflicts. An innovative model of family therapy is discussed, which is based on cognitive restructuring & aimed at changing the perception of family members toward the problem, & the problem person. These perceptual variations are explored on various levels of reality, relative to each family member. The model promotes reality testing, the ability to discriminate between problem & nonproblem behavior, the "solid self" vs the "pseudoself," & change in family members' attitudes from projecting their inadequancies onto others to adopting a self-directed approach that improves their own behavior. 14 References. ¶ The focus of family intervention related to special needs children have generally been on mothers, based on the assumption that fathers are either uninterested or unable to become involved in the care & education of their children. However, a historical & cultural review of the literature suggests that this characterization is not true; fathers, or those who assume paternal roles, want to be involved & have unique characteristics & competencies that foster child development. Specific suggestions for interventionists are made to enhance the involvement of fathers in the planning & implementation of programming related to Public Law 99-457, the Education of the Handicapped Act Amendments of 1986. 2 Tables, 68 References. ¶ Archival data on 106 divorces drawn from the files of Lee County, Ala, are analyzed to test the human capital & needs models of alimony. Results of Tobit regression analyses provide mixed support for both: eg, the human capital model is supported for duration of marriage but not husband's education, while the economic need model is supported for age of wife, but not her education or presence of children. While some indicators of both models are written into Ala's legal code on divorce, most indicators of both models are not predictive of alimony awards in practice. It is suggested that models of alimony should consider consensual, normative factors rather than being constrained by those that find expression in legal codes. 2 Tables, 34 References. ¶ The influence of ethnicity on the relations of children with their grandparents is examined through questionnaire data from 136 children (grades 6-8) of interethnic Oriental-Ashkenazi marriages in Israel. The children showed a small inclination to favor the Ashkenazi side of the family, but generally maintained close connections with both maternal & paternal grandparents. Given the higher status of Ashkenazis in Israeli society, the small difference in relations with grandparents indicates increasing integration within Israel's Jewish society. 2 Tables, 15 References. ¶ Interview data are used to investigate influence strategies utilized at home & work among married, high-achieving professional couples (N = 60, ages 24-52, married 6.5 years). Focus is on work-related resources, self-confidence, dominance, nurturance, & sex. Results indicate that: direct strategies were used more frequently than any other by both women & men; indirect-bilateral strategies were used more frequently at work with a subordinate; & indirect-unilateral strategies were used more frequently at home with a spouse. The findings suggest that when differences in access to job-related resources are equalized, personality variables are stronger predictors of strategy use than is sex. 1 Table, 48 References. ¶ Preadolescents' perceptions of their relationships with parents & siblings are examined in 103 families, from rural areas & small towns, drawing on data obtained via in-home & telephone interviews & inventories from both parents & first-/second-born siblings. Sibling behavior is characterized by 3 dimensions: affection, rivalry, & hostility. Paternal warmth is found to be positively correlated with sibling affection, & both paternal & maternal warmth are negatively correlated with sibling hostility & rivalry. Children who spend the most time in dyadic relationships with their father perceive the most warmth in this relationship & have the most positive & least negative sibling relationships. 2 Tables, 27 References. ¶ To investigate adaptation to new parenthood, including strain & coping strategies, questionnaire data were obtained from 123 couples recruited from prenatal parenting classes in Canberra, Asutralia, before & after the birth of their babies. Results show some support for a model predicting that the level of strain experienced has a negative influence on adaptation, & that high levels of problem-focused coping (vs tension reducing strategies) & access to social support & personal resources (eg, self-esteem) facilitate adaptation. It is suggested that prenatal educational services offer discussions of common stressors likely to occur in the early postnatal period & possible coping methods. 3 Tables, 2 Figures, 30 References. Trost, Jan (Uppsala U, S-751 05 Sweden), What's in a Surname?, Familjerapporter/Family Reports, 1991, 19, 7-20.

¶ Examined is the trend in attitudes in Sweden toward surnames or family names, using questionnaire data collected in 1975 & 1989 (N = 832 & 384 respondents). Three questions were identical on both, asking for preference on spousal surnames being the same, on children having different surnames than one of the parents, & on the same surname for all family members. Results showed that people have become more tolerant toward different names in the family units, & that similar names were not important. Females were more open to different names both times, & by 1989 males had become as tolerant as females were in 1975. In the 1989 questionnaire, there is a correlation between the questions & years of education. Also presented are a history of surnaming & a commentary on the recent trend toward nonmarital cohabitation in Sweden. 4 Tables. J. Mayberry ¶ Open-ended interview data obtained from a nonprobability sample of 51 formerly abused women located in rural & metropolitan areas of 2 midwestern states are drawn on to explore their reasons for leaving a physically abusive male partner. While 66 reasons were identified, most can be categorized under: safety (personal & emotional safety of the women, their children, & others), dependency, & personal growth aspirations. Severely abused respondents perceived leaving as a process occurring over time. These findings suggest that education & support programs must include learning experiences that provide feedback on accomplishments & enhance feelings of adequacy & self-esteem; such women must learn to identify, define, & articulate their personal strengths, needs, & goals. 2 Tables, 12 References. ¶ Questionnaire data obtained from a stratified random sample of 229 nonprofessional & 250 professional females (Fs) on 2 university campuses are analyzed to identify factors influencing the affective qualities of mother/daughter & mother-in-law/daughter-in-law relationships. Filial responsibility attitudes, health of older dyad members, & social support influenced positive affect in both relationships. Contrary to expectations, geographic distance, adult Fs' age, race, nonprofessional/professional work status, & older dyad member's marital status were not predictors. Contact & health of the adult Fs were predictors of positive affect toward mothers but not mothers-in-law. Those findings underscore the importance of focusing on specific dyadic relationships when conducting intergenerational family research. 4 Tables, 55 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Longitudinal interview data obtained 4+ times, 1986-1989, from newlywed couples (N range, 100-800) in Wayne County, Mich, are used to explore the idea that survey research methods, particularly those used in longitudinal studies, can effect enduring changes in attitudes or behavior among respondents. The study group, compared to a control group, was interviewed more frequently, & more intensely. Some evidence is found that participating in the panel procedures had consequences for couples' marital well-being. Compared to the control group, the study group had significantly higher variance in their reported marital satisfaction in the second year of marriage, reflecting their reported lower satisfaction. By the fourth year, however, the marriages of the study couples appeared to be better adjusted on several dimensions of marital quality. 3 Tables, 9 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Researchers in the US have begun examining factors influencing adoptees' attitudes toward obtaining information about their birth parents. The utility of some of the recent methodological perspectives on the contextuality of meaning for the purpose of analyzing interviews with adoptees is examined, arguing that, because of the general tendency among researchers to look only for adoptees' opinions for or against the disclosure of identifying information, the dilemma-ridden nature of their thinking has been ignored. Consequently, the question of how to interpret the contradictory nature of adoption narratives from a sociological point of view has not surfaced, raising a theoretical point concerning the significance of ambivalence & contradiction in sociology. A critique of existing adoption research is presented, suggesting that the contradictory nature of adoption narratives, rather than being interpreted as a sign of immaturity & delusion, can be explained in terms of the ethic of self-discovery & that of reciprocity. It is contended that these two conflicting but intersecting moral vocabularies of motive reflect moral themes in the general culture. 37 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ After reviewing previous research on the relationship between marital status & well-being, an alternative to the causal explanation is proposed that attributes the relationship to selection of happy & healthy people into marriage. Using 2 subjective measures–life satisfaction & subjective health assessments–& 2 objective measures–actual health problems & number of consultations with physicians in the last year–well-being is assessed for a sample of 11,131 Canadians using data from the 1985 General Social Survey. Findings suggest that, overall, single persons are healthier than married & that the causal hypothesis is supported only for subjective life satisfaction scores. However, even this finding fails to suggest the causal relationship because age group variations in the relationship between life satisfaction & marital status fit well with the pattern predicted by the selection hypothesis. Results challenge the view that marriage is causally related to well-being in Canada. 6 Tables, 4 Figures, 15 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Data from a subsample (N = 2,400 parents) of the 1987/88 National Survey of Families & Households are drawn on to examine the consequences of parental divorce & remarriage for parental social, instrumental, & financial support of adult children. Findings show a significant & substantial support deficit (SD) when comparing divorced to first-married parents. Remarriage does not substantially enlarge nor decrease this SD. Although there are gender interactions, SDs are generally significant for both mothers & fathers. With the exception of financial support, SDs from ever-divorced parents appear largely due to lower parent-child solidarity than to decreased parental resources. 2 Tables, 26 References. ¶ A model of perceived & actual social support among adult siblings is tested using data from the 1987/88 National Survey of Families & Households (N = 7,730 adults respondents [Rs]). Despite low levels of actual exchange, nearly 30% of Rs would call on a sibling first in an emergency. Social support among siblings is higher for those with living sisters & for those without adult children, but African Americans & Rs with lower education & family income levels are less likely to be involved in actual exchange with siblings. Although weak support from siblings may simply represent a contraction of the support network to the "inner circle" of parents & children, these findings suggest caution in assuming that disadvantaged groups can rely on stronger extended family networks. 5 Tables, 1 Figure, 41 References. ¶ Annual data on marriage & divorce collected 1980-1988 by the National Center for Health Statistics are drawn on to present differentials in demographic characteristics for remarriages according to the combined marital histories of brides & grooms. In 1988, 745,000 divorced men & 748,000 divorced women remarried: for each sex, 61% married divorced, 35% married single, & 4% married widowed partners. On average, the grooms were age 39 & the brides were age 35, but those who married single partners were younger (35 & 31, respectively) & better educated than average. In the same year, 72,000 widowed men & 77,000 widowed women remarried, at ages 61 & 53, respectively, widowed or divorced partners in similar proportions. By 1988, husbands & wives who jointly remarried at ages 25-44 in 1972 had lower divorce levels than did those who were first married as teenagers. It is concluded that marrying at a young age is a stronger determinant of divorce than is a previous marriage of either or both spouses. 5 Tables, 1 Figure, 18 References. ¶ Parents influence how children cope with their own & others' emotions, which in turn affects children's social behaviors. Research on the socialization of emotions (eg, sympathy & anger expressed during peer interactions) is examined, with attention to individual differences in children that appear to be associated with vicarious emotional responding & tendency to engage in prosocial behaviors. ¶ To demonstrate how measuring a specific aspect of marriage–childrearing disagreements–provides a better understanding of the link betweeen marriage & boys' behavior, 2 studies were conducted in Suffolk County, NY. In study 1, 200 mothers of boys age 3 completed unstandardized measures of marital functioning & child behavior. An index of childrearing disagreements: (1) correlated with a greater variety of behavior problems after accounting for nonchild disagreements, & (2) improved the prediction of behavior problems after accounting for both nonchild disagreements & boys' exposure to marital conflict. In study 2, 87 mothers with sons ages 4-6 completed the same index as well as standard measures of marital functioning & child behavior. Childrearing disagreements: (A) predicted a greater variety of behavior problems than global marital adjustment, & (B) improved the prediction of internalizing problems after controlling for global marital adjustment & boys' exposure to marital conflict. 4 Tables, 22 References. ¶ Toddlerhood antecedents of conscience were examined in 58 US children ages 8-10, initially evaluated at ages 1.5-3.5. The measures of conscience, eg, general affective/moral orientation, extent of reparation, & intensity of guilt feelings, were assessed from narratives produced in response to semiprojective stories involving transgressions, distress, & conflict. Results indicate that maternal-endorsed socialization orientations & observed rearing behaviors that deemphasized the use of power were associated with children's internalized conscience 6 years later. However, these findings were significant only for children who were relatively prone to fearful arousal. The capacity for self-regulation, indexed by extent of early compliance to maternal socialization, predicted children's later internalized conscience. There was preliminary evidence that compliance obtained in a rearing context that deemphasized power assertion was most conducive to the development of conscience. Findings are discussed in view of the interplay of socialization & temperament in moral development. 5 Tables, 60 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Interviews were conducted with Japanese & Israeli mothers (N = 60 each) of kindergarten children to explore their views on the separateness & independence, & obedience/disobedience of their children. Findings indicate that for the Japanese mothers, the capacity of the child to manage on his/her own is expressed in cutting exclusive ties with mother & interacting with other children; Israeli mothers emphasize children's instrumental independence in taking care of themselves, performing household tasks, & being able to occupy themselves constructively. Japanese mothers also report behaviors that can be labeled as instrumental independence, but present them as examples of obedience. Israeli mothers describe the child's instrumental independence as internal, often putting the mother in a conflict situation (ie, wanting the child to be independent but not at an inappropriate time or in unsuitable endeavors). Japanese mothers did not mention this type of dilemma. 2 Tables, 26 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Continuity between parenting in childhood & the child's social networks & intimate relationships in adulthood is investigated in a detailed literature review. Some studies suggest links between the quality of parental care in childhood & diffuse measures of social support in adulthood; these links appeared more often among women & psychologically healthy adults. However, on closer examination, the linkage could be spurious, due to general response bias, or a causal process. Studies using the Parental Bonding Inventory (Parker, G., Tupling, H., & Brown, L. B., "A Parental Bonding Instrument," British Journal of Medical Psychology, 1979, 52, 1-10) & specific measures of adult intimate bonds fail to establish any linkage at all, except in situations of gross deprivation of parental care. In the latter case, the respondent's current partner was also rated as extremely deficient in care. These results suggest a refinement of the continuity hypothesis for broad social attachment in adulthood: specifically, later interpersonal relations beyond childhood with intimate partners & significant others may influence social bonding. ¶ The policy against birth control propagated by adherents to the Old Laestadian revivalist movement is discussed, focusing on the origins of this phenomenon. The attitudes of this religious group were influenced by the climate of the 1960s, when many traditional societal values were shifting. For the Old Laestadians, disallowing any form of birth control was a way of stabilizing the traditional family structure & assuring the movement's own continuity. It is noted, however, that such rigid principles did not mesh with the increasingly urban lifestyle of most people; gradually, members of the movement ceased to observe the ban, & the debate on birth control within the movement ended. Focus was shifted to positive aspects of religious life, & an attempt was made to adjust to the urban way of life. 12 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The effects of selected sociodemographic factors on the timing of first birth in Ghana are investigated using data from a 1979/80 fertility survey (N = 6,125 women ages 15-49). Results indicate that, on the whole, births occur relatively early, & family size tends to be larger, despite a recent decline in fertility. These patterns of family formation are influenced by socioeconomic factors such as education, wage employment, & urbanization. 3 Tables, 25 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The Brazilian Ministry of Health's 1988 suspension of permission for experimentation with the contraceptive Norplant (a timed release drug implanted in the user's body) represented a transformation of the Ministry's role since prior to this intervention, it had been a weak government organization in the face of the privatization of scientific investigation & the mystique of technological progress. Between 1975 & 1982, three developments in Brazil had served to focus attention on scientific research related to gender: the participation of women in social activities promoted by progressive churches, the actions of political parties toward women, & the strategies of the feminist movement. The press began reporting on Norplant research in mid-1984; the majority of the reports were favorable, but the seeds of opposition were planted. The feminist critique of Norplant experimentation cited methodological & ethical problems of the investigation, lack of safety precautions, & the prioritization of scientific rationalism as a rationale for the testing. Feminists encouraged birth control, but favored methods in which the woman would have more autonomy. This incident constitutes a moment of democratic communication for Brazil, a communication that citizens have a responsibility to maintain. 72 References. ¶ Parallels are identified in the history of abortion in Canada & the US. In both countries, technology played a pivotal role in creating dissension on abortion, which caused physicians who were worried about potential medical liability to lobby for reform measures that catalyzed public debate & spawned both the right-to-life & the abortion-rights movements. It is argued that differences in court structures & capacities permitted the US abortion reform movement to surmount a variety of legislative obstacles more quickly than the prochoice movement in Canada; Canadians were unable to achieve reform until much later because they could not produce an abortion rights doctrine until 1982, the year the Charter of Rights & Freedoms was written into their Constitution. 30 References. ¶ Multivariate autoregressive models of the effects of cohort size on key aspects of fertility among US cohorts of whites & blacks born 1905-1954 are developed using time-series data. They include unemployment as a measure of possible indirect effects, & control for educational attainment, women's labor force participation, economic growth, farm origins, foreign origins, & contraceptive diffusion. Results show that the effects of cohort size on fertility differ by race: it has quite small effects on the fertility of whites, but larger & more pervasive effects on the fertility of blacks. This difference may reflect the concentration of blacks in stagnant sectors of the labor market. 2 Tables, 2 Figures, 24 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Legal issues surrounding court-ordered prenatal intervention in gestational substance abuse are examined. Though, in theory, the legal rights of the fetus not to suffer abuse or neglect are balanced against maternal rights of privacy & the withholding or refusal of treatment, the courts have found that dispensing with maternal rights is sometimes justified to protect the well-being of the child. The crucial issue is when, under what circumstances, & with what type of intervention the state should intervene. Several standards of care for determining the liability of the mother have been proposed: (1) the Roe v. Wade standard; (2) the neglected child standard; (3) the reasonable mother standard; & (4) the independent strict liability standard. Types of interventions include mandatory toxicological screening, criminalization, civil commitment, & medical intervention. D. Generoli

The issue of paternity relitigation hangs in the balance of two competing legal principles: (1) preclusion, which serves judicial economy & defendant rights by barring subsequent suits between the same parties on the same claim or issue; & (2) privity, the identification of two persons' interests & legal rights, which protects the child. The conflict can be resolved by requiring the courts to join the child in the initial paternity action. In the absence of joinder, the child's right to relitigate should be maintained in cases where the child's interests were not adequately represented in previous legal action. D. Generoli

¶ In an exploration of the feminist demand for the right of women to control their own bodies in relation to new reproductive technologies, several cases are drawn on to show that when it is possible to justify disallowing a woman to control her own body & permitting the legal system to control it for her, the discourse of the dualism of the body proves to be an inadequate framework for arguing for women's autonomy. Controlling women's bodies from a medico-legal framework is justifiable only if the notion of the body as an object distinct from the self is accepted; if this is rejected, then dismissing a pregnant woman's right to self-determination is not justifiable. It is argued that the body is both a physical manifestation of the self & a significant part of the self; as such, a woman has the right to control her own body, which is tantamount to control of herself. 15 References. ¶ Data from the 1977/78 Kenya Fertility Survey (N not provided) are drawn on to examine the socioeconomic & cultural effects of both cumulative & recent fertility. Cross-tabulation analysis reveals marked differentials in fertility according to a woman's level of education; this variable has a greater influence in restraining fertility than that of husband's education. Women with 5+ years of schooling married to husbands of similar or higher levels of education have the smallest number of children. The fertility differential is even more marked according to rural-urban residence; women residing in metropolitan centers (Nairobi & Mombasa) have markedly lower fertility than their counterparts in rural areas. Differentials in fertility according to other socioeconomic factors, eg, residential region, ethnic group, & husband's occupation, are not apparent. 7 Tables, 1 Figure, 18 References. ¶ The medical realities of reproductive & genetic engineering & their impact on women are examined, focusing on the development of in vitro fertilization (IVF) in a global context. It is warned that this development, along with fertility-control methods, could be implemented as the ultimate means of population control, particularly in Third World countries. If women's "imperfect" bodies need "assisted reproduction," birth may become a controlled technological event; the development of IVF has opened up to researchers a pool of healthy women as living test sites, whereby they are reduced to body parts that can be fragmented, dissected, & recombined at will. It is concluded that these "violent" technologies are too dangerous to use, contribute to the worldwide oppression of women, & must be stopped before they further diminish women's sense of self. 23 References. Kligman, Gail (Stanford U, CA 94305), Abortion and International Adoption in Post-Ceausescu Romania, UM Feminist Studies, 1992, 18, 2, summer, 405-419.

¶ Three years after a strict antiabortion law had been signed by former dictator Nicolae Ceausescu, abortion became fully legal in Romania in 1989. For some women, however, paticularly poor or single ones, the transition from a command, state-controlled economy to a market economy has contributed to the continued exploitation of their reproductive labor. By summer 1991, the skyrocketing number of abortions illuminated such issues as the determination of priorities in a country in total disorder, the financial responsibility for the development & distribution of contraceptives, & the need for AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) research, treatment, & education. Furthermore, years of propaganda against the use of contraceptives had to be combated. Without a concerted campaign to educate the population, some physicians fear that women's health will continue to be at risk. The vulnerability of women & children has also emerged in the context of the international adoption of Romanian children in exchange for hard currency, authorized by Ceausescu during the later years of the regime. The victims of this process have not only been foreign adoptive parents but also poor or single Romanian mothers, many of them Gypsies. In July 1991, a new adoption law stopped the Romanian baby trade. S. Millett ¶ Interview data from a convenience sample of 150 married women attending health clinics for reasons other than pregnancy or childbearing are used to examine patterns of contraception among women in Taipei, Taiwan. Findings reveal that the intrauterine device is the most prevalent method of contraception followed by the condom & birth control pills. Respondents (Rs) tended to be satisfied with their contraceptive method; many had used only one method, & 64% indicated they did not want to change methods. It is suggested that most women are poorly informed about their methods, since they do not evaluate them in terms of possible side effects. Taiwan's continued emphasis on family planning may explain why only 17% of the Rs had undergone abortion. Women of higher educational status were more informed about methods of contraception. 4 Tables, 27 References. Adapted from the source document.

Discriminant function analysis shows that the sexual behavior patterns of black adolescent Fs changed over 3 cohorts (1950s, 1960s, & 1970s) & that those of the 1960s were less vulnerable to early onset of sexual intercourse & risk of early pregnancy (under age 15) than those of the 1950s & 1970s. The impact on this pattern of the sexual revolution & the civil rights movement during the 1960s is discussed. Factors in first pregnancies during early adolescence are shown to be significantly different than those in later adolescence (ages 18-20). For the cohorts studied, personal & family experiences were good predictors of late adolescent pregnancies, while geographical residence (mainly metropolitan) was more predictive of pregnancy in early adolescence. Those whose pregnancies occurred in late adolescence were older at first coitus, had completed more years of schooling, had married parents living together, & were more likely to have received sex education from parents. 3 Tables, 50 References. ¶ To investigate the relationship between women's year of birth & their age at the birth of their first child, secondary analysis was performed on demographic data from Jaarcijfers van Nederland ([Annual Statistics for the Netherlands], The Hague: Central Bureau of Statistics) for women born 1940-1960. The later the woman's birth year, the fewer children she had before age 26. Three theories are tested to account for this trend: (1) the generation theory of H. A. Becker presented in "Generaties" ([Generations], Hollands Maandblad, 1985, 4, 14-25); (2) the demographic perspective offered in R. E. Here, data obtained via semistructured interviews with 18 women, ages 18-34, & telephone interviews with 300+ other adults in Madison, Wisc, were used to develop a structured survey instrument that incorporates uncertainties, in this case, uncertainty about fertility. ¶ Using raw monthly data from annual Vital Statistics of the US volumes, 1947-1980, published by the National Center for Health Statistics, it is shown that the seasonal pattern of fertility, with summer months producing lower conception rates, applies to nonwhites as well as whites. However, for the total population, the summer trough in births is shrinking in magnitude due to the spread of air conditioning, which reduces the heat of summer. The summer hypothesis is further buttressed by evidence that summer temperature extremes explain a significant portion of the variation around the seasonal trend, in both the North & South. Assimilation & disruption appear to effect the reproductive behavior of Mexican-origin women but no evidence of adaptation effect were found. Toft, Monica Duffy & McIntyre, David P., Adoption as an Issue of Local Justice, UM Archives Européennes de Sociologie, 1992, 33, 1, 83-105.

¶ Examined is the local justice issue of adoption in the US. Local justice is understood through Jon Elster's formulation of the concept (see SA 39:1/91X3537) as a way of thinking about how scarce goods & burdens are allocated by local, low-level institutions. It is argued that adoption criteria have been surprisingly flexible depending on the ratio of adoptees to prospective adoptive parents. The ratio is conceived in terms of supply & demand: when the demand for a particular child exceeds supply, the selection criteria are more stringently applied to potential parents. It is shown that the primary allocative principle (ie, that the interests & needs of the child are first & foremost) is rigidly followed by adoption agencies, although the criteria by which these agencies select parents remain flexible to accommodate as many children as possible. Several issues relating to the adoption process are discussed, & transracial adoptions are explored to show how the adoption process, especially the criteria for selecting parents, has changed in response to the number & type of available adoptable children. 33 References. Weiss, Gregory L. (Roanoke Coll, Salem VA 24153), Public Attitudes about Surrogate Motherhood, Michigan Sociological Review, 1992, 6, fall, 15-27.

¶ Interviews conducted with 400 randomly selected residents in a medium-sized community (Roanoke Valley, Va) reveals that attitudes about the propriety of surrogate motherhood are divided, but a majority disapprove. Opposition is most common among those with traditionally conservative views on social policy issues (the elderly & those favoring school prayer & opposing abortion). Those approving of surrogate motherhood are more likely to believe a contested baby should go to the contractng couple. Plausible explanations for these patterns are discussed, & directions outlined for their empirical testing in future research. 2 Tables, 21 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The practice of surrogacy is placed in its social context by comparing past & present surrogate practice in terms of changes in the meaning of the family, new reproductive technologies, adoption, infertility, & demographic trends in Western societies. Considering the family as a dynamic social institution, it is argued that the practice of modern surrogate motherhood lies in the transition away from the conventional nuclear family. Moral & legal aspects of surrogacy are briefly considered, & its practice in traditional & contemporary South Africa is reviewed. 24 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Trend analyses of female (F)/male (M) suicide rates in the US, 1950-1984, along with a regression of the ratios on white F educational attainment, labor force participation, & fertility & divorce rates, are conducted to test general (economic)/conjugal anomie & sex-role convergence explanations of the influence of social change on changes in suicide rates, as postulated by Emile Durkheim in Suicide: A Study in Sociology (Spaulding, J. A., & Simpson, G. [Tr], New York: Free Press, 1966). Results are mixed for different age groups. It is concluded that general anomie may not explain suicide trends for groups actively supporting social changes, or for the young (who are not yet tradition-bound), or very old (whose retirement status reduces the importance of some social changes). 4 Tables, 5 Figures, 44 References. ¶ To provide a historical analysis of how the labeling of suicide has changed, 14 lexical articles are examined from German civil & ecclesiastical encyclopedias published 1743-1980. In accordance with Norbert Elias's Der Prozess der Zivilisation ([The Civilizing Process] see IRPS No. 16/83c0199 & 83c0200) & Michel Foucault's Wahnsinn und Gesellschaft ([Madness and Civilization] Frankfurt, 1973), sociohistorical processes of change in essays on suicide are studied on the lexical discourse level. Two complementary processes can be observed: (1) the disappearance of institutionalized direct measures against suicide; & (2) an increase in studies viewing suicide as pathology. New theoretical approaches accounting for the shift to pathologization are reviewed. 42 References. Adapted from the source document. MANOVAs indicate that: women were disproportionately more supported than men; suicide survivors received less support than natural death survivors; lower levels of practical help were reported by survivors 6 months after the deaths, particularly for natural death; suicide survivors indicated less confidential & consoling support from their network of friends than did survivors of natural deaths; & there was an increase in the support level by the end of the second year equaling that immediately following the death. 6 Tables, 23 References. ¶ The "fraud complex" was developed to explain why successful college students have a higher suicide rate than their less successful counterparts. ¶ Questionnaire data for 157 adolescents ages 13-16 who had experienced the death of a sibling within the 5-year period prior to the study are used to generate a theory of adolescent sibling bereavement (ASB). A taxonomy of the ASB process, resulting from responses to the question, "If you could ask or tell your dead sibling something, what would it be?" was comprised of 6 mutually exclusive categories including regretting, endeavoring to understand, catching up, reaffirming, influencing, & reuniting. Results reveal that the ASB process is not time bound & that bereaved siblings experience a persistent, ongoing attachment to their deceased siblings. While the process has past, present, & future dimensions, these dimensions become intermeshed as the bereavement process ensues. Findings support the need to challenge the accepted conflicting viewpoints & "mythologies" about bereavement in general & ASB in particular. Because adolescents are simultaneously coping with the situational crisis of sibling death & the typical developmental crises of the age, they are particularly vulnerable to dysfunctional outcomes. Implications for further research are discussed. 2 Tables, 1 Figure, 33 References. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ Attributions about suicide as a function of gender & context (athletic vs relationship failure) were explored experimentally in a sample of 128 undergraduates in Norfolk, Va. Results indicate that male (M) athletes who committed suicide were considered more emotionally well-adjusted than Ms who did so because of a relationship failure, & than all females (Fs). Athletes of both sexes who suicided were seen as more competent & less distressed compared to those who suffered a failed relationship; Fs were also seen as more distressed than Ms. Results are discussed in terms of a positive bias toward athletes in US society, as well as gender stereotypes. Implications of the findings & methodological limitations are noted. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 15 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ In a discussion of films on death, it is argued that ethnographic films are not best understood or employed by academic anthropologists when treated as one-off, free-standing creations, but should be assessed in the contexts of all other written or filmed materials relevant to the situation depicted. Also discussed are modalities in which ethnographic documentary films communicate with us, including: (1) documentation modality, where the film & its sound track may be understood to resemble historical documents; (2) explanatory modality, a refinement of documentation, but with a decidedly conceptual, context-setting, & elaborating set of statements, whether voiced or written; (3) rejection of explanation, where the aims of the filmmaker invite the audience to suspend conceptual thinking, in favor of a more implicit & intuitive apprehension, often achieved by montage; (4) research-context enrichment, which directs attention away from the research-filmmaker as a subjective observer, & back into the filmed subjects & their world; (5) the concentration of the experiental side of filmed subjects, & how contextualized experience may be brought into the service of even the most abstract theory. A plea is made for the recognition in academic circles that the paths to conceptual understanding are plural, not singular, & that those aspects of film that encourage apprehension of other cultures may not necessarily work best through high-density conceptual statements. 4 Photographs. ¶ With the emphasis of technology & questioning of traditional religious explanations of dying & death, Western culture has historically been characterized by its denial of death. Contemporary Western society has relegated the clinical aspects of aging to medical technology. However, as Western culture increasingly recognizes death as a human & not a technical problem, new perceptions of death & dying are emerging. It is argued that the recognition of dying & death as part of, or the end of, life, helps to bring about an integration between the process of living & dying. 2 Tables, 63 References. ¶ Mail questionnaire data from a random sample of administrators at 463 long-term care facilities across the US reveal 4 environmental characteristics related to suicidal behavior & deaths from suicide: staff turnover, size, auspices, & per diem cost. More suicides occurred in larger facilities & those with higher staff turnover. Religious or "other" facilities experienced more suicidal deaths than did public or private ones, as did those facilities that charged less. It is concluded that modifying the institutional environment may be of key importance in preventing suicide in long-term care facilities. 5 Tables, 20 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Content analysis of interview & questionnaire data obtained from 46 women ages 35-60 whose mothers had died within the previous 5 years revealed that a daughter's ability to resolve the grief associated with her mother's death was significantly affected by the kind of relationship they had when the mother was alive. Women whose grief reactions were more resolved were more likely to have had close, mutually accepting relationships with their mothers. Those whose reactions remained unresolved were more likly to have had relationships that were ambivalent, conflictual, or emotionally distant. These findings provide new evidence of the important influence that mother-daughter relationships have throughout life. 2 Tables, 29 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An examination of the discourse on & incidence of suicide in Paris, France, 1800-1850, based on statistics & the morgue registers. Analysis shows that: the number of suicides failed to keep pace with the accelerating growth of the city; the thesis that urbanization exacerbated social disorganization & spurred an increase in suicides is unwarranted; & suicide did not rank among the ten leading causes of death. A brief review of sociological approaches to suicide is given, & it is argued that the first analyses of suicide by alienists & moral statisticians have been unjustly overlooked by contemporary researchers. It is shown that, despite limits to their orginality, early nineteenth-century studies of suicide pioneered the data sets & methods that later suicidologists would adopt. 3 Tables, 11 Charts, 2 Maps. ¶ In an investigation of news media influence on suicides, it is hypothesized that suicide stories will have their greatest impact when audience receptivity is high. Since it is argued that unemployment directly fosters a suicidal mood, the influence of the Depression, 1933-1939, is studied via a search of the front pages of all New York Times newspapers during the period (N = 2,557) for stories of suicides. After an analysis of monthly data on suicides & published stories of the suicides of entertainers, foreigners, murder-suicides, & political leaders, only the latter were found to be associated with increased suicide among the general public; reasons for this lack of media influence are postulated. 1 Table, 47 References. Occupational variables include employment status, reasons for not working, & satisfaction with work. Results indicate that: workers were healthier than nonworkers; individuals who had stopped working were less healthy than those still working; workers who expressed satisfaction with their work were healthier than those who did not; the associations between job satisfaction & health were constant even when education & origin were controlled; & job dissatisfaction was not significantly associated with angina pectoris, potential myocardial infarction, or hypertension. ¶ In the early years of the German Democratic Republic, epidemiological data indicated that more progress was being made there in health care than in West Germany, supporting the claim that socialism was superior to capitalism. However, in retrospect, several shortcomings of the socialist system have become apparent. The perpetual shortages felt throughout the economy certainly affected health care. Also, certain social sectors had a privileged access to care not available to most citizens. By denying the differentiation of social status under socialism or regarding it as a phenomenon that would soon wither away, physicians were unable to discuss this problem even in the framework of graduate medical education. Ironically, the ostensibly equal treatment of patients helped reproduce existing inequalities. 5 References. Adapted from the source document as translated by M. Meeks. Antwort und Verantwortung der Pflegeberufe* ([Illness and Society. Response and Responsibility of the Care Occupations] Freiburg: Lambertus, 1989 [see listings in IRPS No. 66]). Currently, 12% of Germany's gross national product is spent on health care. Thus, medical sociology is gaining in importance. Bruckenberger deals with long-term patient care from the viewpoint of social act theory. His work presents valuable data & statistics & is very informative in its treatment of politics & administration. Deppe's, Friederich's, & Müller's work is a welcome alternative to the overly theoretical works often appearing in sociology of medicine. Research on the health care system should no longer be considered the exclusive domain of economists: political scientists, sociologists, & psychologists should also become involved. Rohrbacher deals with problems in the area of pharmaceutical counseling & marketing in Germany with potentially serious consequences. Welter-Enderlin discusses recent developments in the treatment of chronic somatic diseases, eg, polyarthritis, which can lead to depression & negative self-image. Wetzel provides an overview of contributions presented at the European CICIAMS Congress, held in Munich, Germany, in 1988. Ideas applicable to the German health care system are reviewed. M. ¶ Since the mid-1980s it has been clear that an understanding of the full epidemiological dimensions of the AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) epidemic necessitates not only enumeration of diagnosed cases, but also understanding of the prevalence & incidence of HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) infection. Because mandatory testing of individuals was rejected on ethical & pragmatic grounds, it became necessary to devise an alternative strategy. The approach widely recognized as meeting the epidemiological challenge was the blinded, unlinked, seroprevalence study, in which blood samples drawn for purposes other than HIV screening are stripped permanently of all personal identifiers before they are subject to testing for HIV. Thus, samples–not persons–are tested. In the US, proposals to undertake such studies were carefully evaluated by experts in law & medical ethics, as well as by advocates of privacy, & little objection was raised. In GB & the Netherlands, however, blinded seroprevalence studies provoked sharp controversies involving matters of informed consent, privacy, & the duty of physicians to inform their patients of information critical to their well-being. The nature of that controversy is detailed here. Modified AA

¶ The development in 1988 of New Zealand's first set of health goals & targets is assessed within the context of the current reawakening of public health concerns & fiscal crisis. Six criteria were used to define health problems & ten goal areas selected, with specific, quantified targets for 1995 & 2000. The goal areas included tobacco contol, secondary prevention of cervical cancer, & reduction of road accident injury & death. The matrix of policy options for resource allocation & public health is described, arguing that it represents one solution to fiscal & ideological challenges: that of a new managerialism allied with a new public health. The need for ideological renewal & fiscal probity preserved a strong role for the state in health & health care. 1 Figure, 45 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An examination of caregiver responses to communication attempts by confused Alzheimer's disease patients; 26 episodes of conversation between patients & caregivers (N = 10 & 8, respectively) were videotaped. ¶ To determine reasons behind unequal health care provisions in the Netherlands, questionnaire data were obtained from 85 hospital directors; about 66% of the hospital problems they cited are related to the difference in influence that various health care organizations have on the government. The process method is used to determine the amount of influence per organization. A multivariate explanation is given for differences in influence among general hospitals. A theoretical model for determining differences in influence is tested using LISREL VII. Analysis reveals that the government is unaffected by the type of hospital, management, & socioeconomic context. ¶ The AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) crisis has already triggered change in the delivery of drug abuse treatment in many settings & will likely trigger additional & more extensive change. Here, examined is the extent to which treatment programs will need to assume responsibility for aggressive outreach, for establishing liaison to assure medical & hospital care–when needed–for providing antiviral medications, for developing support groups &/or grief counseling for clients & staff, for implementing extended aftercare, & for contacting & counseling clients' spouses & sexual partners, etc. The impact of AIDS on recruitment & retention of qualified treatment staff is considered, along with the extent to which treatment may need to change in quality to permit a greater quantity of clients to be served, eg, in methadone programs. Also discussed is the need to redefine treatment as behavior change strategies capable of being conducted in community settings outside of traditional drug abuse treatment–eg, in shelters & with individuals initially located in emergency rooms–in order to provide for the health & well-being of the individual & his/her community. 17 References. ¶ Though the concept of rationing health care is symbolically offensive, its acceptance is crucial to the establishment of universal health care (UHC). In the US, UHC is constrained by the practical politics of taxpayers' unwillingness to pay an unlimited amount. Health care is a limited resource, & rationing is a practical consideration that must precede, & cannot be separated from, UHC. The main criticism of rationing–that it will place a disproportionate burden on the poor–can be avoided by setting a baseline of adequate care that balances medical judgment, economic possibilities, & public values. Ore's health care initiative is discussed as an example. D. Generoli

¶ In a contribution to the understanding of patient-physician (MD) communication, a comparative analysis is presented of 2 clinical interviews conducted by third-year residents with patients from an outpatient clinic of a large teaching hospital. The analysis draws on studies of medical discourse, conversational storytelling, & narrative to show how patients negotiate a story topic, set the scene, & clarify the action & its consequences, & how MDs adopt distinctive alignments with regard to the emerging story. Differences between the two encounters appear to be related to the outcomes of the encounters, including the framing of clinical decisions & the maintenance of cooperative patient-MD relations. 1 Appendix, 58 References. ¶ An exploration of the subcultural definition, meaning, & use of risk associated with AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) transmission among intravenous drug users (IVDUs), based on street-based ethnographic research conducted 1987-1989 & a 1988 survey administered to 66 IVDUs in 2 Mass drug treatment facilities. Risk taking, risk perception, & strategies for minimizing risks associated with maintaining a drug habit are analyzed in the context of how IVDUs respond to the risks associated with HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) transmission. Research indicates that risk needs to be viewed within the context of the subculture to effect strategies to reduce HIV-related risk behavior. 6 Tables, 40 References. ¶ Various discourses about acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) are shown to reflect a broader medical issue: the intersection of biological & cultural dimensions of illness. The ways by which the experience of disease takes on meaning & becomes entangled in wider political struggles are considered. Funding allocations, eg, are irreducibly social decisions; when risk is popularly localized among politically marginalized communities, as in the case of AIDS, funding decisions are ideologically charged. ¶ The German Democratic Republic was wholly dominated by the state. Social subsystems were controlled & planned by the government without consideration for the specific needs or rationality of each area. Analysis of the health care delivery system since 1960 reveals an irrational increase in the number of ambulatory care facilities. The current shift since national reunification toward privatization of health care presents numerous problems for people raised according to socialist ideology. The problems faced by the populace in eastern Germany are vastly underestimated by the western media. Residents must learn how to simultaneously make use of medical care offered by private physicians & state-run clinics. 1 Table, 16 References. Adapted from the source document as translated by M. Eyre, Stephen L. (School Medicine U California, San Francisco 94143-0374), Emotional Conflict as a Weapon against AIDS, Anthropology Today, 1991, 7, 2, Apr, 2-4.

¶ One criticism of the US cultural response to AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) is that AIDS has become a pejorative metaphor. A precursor of this type of argument is Susan Sontag's "Illness as Metaphor" (Illness as Metaphor and AIDS and Its Metaphors, New York: Doubleday, 1990 [1978], 1-87), in which she argues that the modern "mythology" that illness is an expression of emotional conflict has victimized the severely ill. Here, presented is a narrative account of a person with ARC (AIDS related complex) who subscribes to such a philosophy. Data were obtained as part of a person-centered ethnographic study of the beliefs, behaviors, & roles employed by gay men to cope with HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) illness. The case traces the emergence of this man's perception that certain of his symptoms are an expression of conflicts in his relationship with his father. This metaphor, it is argued, captures multiple themes of loss of control, feelings of guilt about nonproductivity, & anger, & focuses them in an outlook conducive to action. Rhetorical structures employed in such constructions--in particular the general trope that illness is a volitional act--are discussed in questioning Sontag's victimization argument, & an attempt is made to illustrate the utility of metaphor in rendering meaning & organizing behavior in the face of extreme suffering. ¶ A rebuttal of the main arguments underlying Larry Gostin's call for health care professionals' voluntary deferral from selected invasive procedures ("The HIV-Infected Health Care Worker," Assoc for Practitioners for Infection Control, Position Paper, 1990, 18, 371-381), contending that the approach has both legal & practical flaws. It is argued that Gostin's assertion that the risk of an infected health care professional transmitting HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) to any one patient is low does not withstand critical analysis, since there are insufficient data to determine the true risk of transmitting HIV during invasive procedures. Furthermore, his policy of voluntary deferral might also ultimately, though inadvertently, lead to a system of mandatory testing. An alternative approach is presented whereby the Centers for Disease Control or state health departments would recommend that HIV-positive professionals not be mandatorily excluded from certain procedures, nor be encouraged to self-defer from selected procedures, but rather be mandated to follow the strictest infection control requirements. 31 References. ¶ Associations between social relationships & health are examined using a social epidemiological approach & a family interaction approach. It is hypothesized that social relationships (ie, social support & family functioning) will exert direct & indirect effects on health behaviors, & these effects will be better explained by family functioning than by social support. Questionnaire responses were obtained from 83 patients, age 40+, receiving primary medical care at the U of Rochester (NY) Family Medicine Center. Structural modeling & regression analysis show that: there are both indirect & direct statistically significant paths from social relationships to health behaviors; family criticism is directly associated with depressive symptoms; & family emotional involvement is directly associated with both depresssive symptoms & healthy cardiovascular behaviors. Results support the primacy of family functioning factors in understanding the connections between health & social relationships. Implications for future research are discussed. 4 Tables, 2 Figures, 1 Appendix, 94 References. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ Contending that the impact of AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) on government policies reflects both social values & political & organizational relationships in Western countries, case studies are presented of GB & Germany, discussing similarities & differences in the functions accorded to the voluntary sector in the pattern of responses to AIDS. Typical problems confronted by emergent voluntary sector welfare agencies are noted, & particular features of AIDS service organizations described. Separate accounts are given of the development of a federated network of AIDS service organizations (ASOs) in Germany & of contrasting efforts in the UK. While the governments share a concern to confine the activity of ASOs to serving the needs of those groups directly affected by AIDS, other significant differences in policy development are noted, probably attributable to differences in the organizational structure of the health sector. 34 References. Results show that experiencing desirable events in a 6-month period reduces the number of MD visits, but not uniformly; eg, experiencing 3 events was associated with nearly as many MD visits as no events. ¶ An overview of guidelines established by the Centers for Disease Control (CDC) for preventing transmission of the human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) & hepatitis B virus (HBV) from health care professionals to patients. Voluntary HIV & HBV testing for all health care workers performing exposure-prone invasive procedures is recommended. Discussion focuses on the availability of data that demonstrate a risk of transmission, how much avoidable risk public health authorities should allow patients to face, & who should bear the burden of uncertainty in interpreting the data. It is concluded that the CDC guidelines provide a reasonable balance in current scientific understanding of HIV & HBV, & accord HIV-infected professionals with dignity & respect by making HIV testing voluntary, limiting the conditions to invasive procedures, & calling for compassionate systems of retraining & compensation. (SPA)

¶ Descriptive analysis of 1988 Cuban census statistics show that the province of Guantanamo has mortality & morbidity rates lower than those of the country in general, & that within Guantanamo, rural areas have rates lower than urban-rural or urban areas. The principal causes of mortality in Guantanamo are similar to those in the rest of the country–heart problems, malignant tumors, cerebro-vascular illness, & accidents. The number & location of health services in Guantanamo are described by specialty. Rural municipalities have better coverage of family practitioners than the other area types, since rural areas have been prioritized for extension of the model of ambulatory medical attention. The number of medical consultations per inhabitant is greater in urban municipalities, however. Urban municipalities also have much better coverage in water systems & reclamation of solid waste than do other areas. Overall, the picture is that of homogenization of the health situation in Guantanamo. 9 Tables. M. Pflum

¶ A review of competing etiological theories popular in early nineteenth-century British public health, highlighting the Chadwickian movement that finally prevailed. Early concepts of the constitutional origins of disease distinguished exciting & predisposing causes. Later, contagion-anticontagion theories formed alternative explanations. While the most popular etiological model, the predisposing cause, focused mainly on the physical aspect of illness, & was considered a sufficient condition for the outbreak of disease, social factors contributing to disease were also given importance. Although his agenda was mistakenly labeled anticontagionist, Edwin Chadwick's success lay in an exclusive pursuit of the single, hypothetical exciting cause in the formative stages of the public health movement (1838-1842). The more sophisticated predisposing causes model that recognized the multiple determinants of disease was thus abandoned. 1 Table. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A treatise on the Newtonian mechanistic paradigm & the holistic paradigm as they relate to special education theory, research, & practice. Addressed are assumptions about the nature of reality & the nature of knowledge claims that underlie Newtonian mechanistic thought, the discontent with mechanistic thought & the calls for a paradigm change across the social sciences, & conceptual misunderstandings within the field of special education that stand in the way of paradigmatic change. Theoretical reorientation & an alternative holistic paradigm are presented. It is concluded that, rather than paradigms or paradigm shifts existing within the field, the field is part of a paradigm that is undergoing change across the sciences & social sciences. In Comments Related to Professor Heshusius' Application of Paradigm Change to Special Education, Richard P. Iano (Temple U, Philadelphia, Pa) agrees that the mechanistic paradigm has had a limiting effect on education, primarily by promoting a reliance on measurable outcomes identified through standardized tests. Another kind of study that gives adequate recognition to the creative well-developed judgment of teachers as they develop educational programs is recommended. In Natural Science Approaches to Questions of Subjectivity, Barbara G. Licht (Florida State U, Tallahassee) & Joseph K. Torgesen agree that the holistic-qualitative approach can enhance the understanding of special education, but see no compelling argument to switch to a new paradigm. It is argued that all the weaknesses Heshusius points out in special education can be addressed by natural science research, & that holistic/qualitative goals & methods are not incompatible with the natural science paradigm. In Paradigm Accountability (Reaction Paper to Heshusius' "The Newtonian Mechanistic ...," Howard S. Adelman (U of California, Los Angeles) agrees that the paradigm is inappropriate in nature & scope but is unsure what role holism will play in the future. It is contended that the value of Heshusius's paper is in its call for paradigm accountability. 1 Figure, 109 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ As health maintenance organizations (HMOs) have enjoyed success as alternative health care delivery systems, competition among individual HMOs intensified. The 1990s will thus require continued attention to the effective delivery of quality services to clients. To establish a strong competitive position in the marketplace, health care providers will have to understand how their customers perceive value in the services rendered. ¶ An examination of health insurance coverage among Americans, based on analysis of census data for 1980-1991 & published national interview data collected 1976-1989. Results show that the number of Americans without insurance increased by 1.3 million 1989-1990, bringing the total of uninsured Americans to 34.7 million. This increase coincides with a 10.5% increase in health spending & a 3.4 million increase in the number of people covered by Medicaid. Of the additional 1.3 million uninsured, 77% were males, 32% had family incomes of $50,000 or more, & 74% had family incomes above $25,000. ¶ The case of AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) is used as a test of the thesis that a subjective view of reality, here termed "everyday knowledge" or "everyday theories," is often more relevant in explaining behavior than objective knowledge based on expert information. The analysis is based on data obtained in the summer 1990 from a representative sample of 2,000 adults in the Federal Republic of Germany who were surveyed concerning the perceived infectiousness of AIDS, the etiology of AIDS, intended ways of dealing with those infected & readiness to support compulsory governmental measures. Findings reveal that the perceived degree of infectiousness of AIDS in an everyday environment was higher among older respondents (Rs) & those of lower social status; higher status, younger age, & urban residence were correlated with a lower degree of perceived infectiousness. Willingness to accept governmental coercive measures appeared dependent on the subjective perception of infectious risk & on the inclination to regard AIDS as a consequence of "wrong" behavior. 11 Tables, 70 References. ¶ Questionnaire data are used to investigate AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) risk behavior & knowledge among 32 male (M) & 28 female (F) chronic psychiatric outpatients from an urban mental health clinic in Wisc. Descriptive analysis reveals substantial deficits in AIDS risk knowledge in this population. More than 50% of the patients had been sexually active in the month & in the year before the interview, but condom usage was reported as infrequent. Also, 42% of Ms & 19% of Fs had had multiple sexual partners in the past year; 20% of these partners had been encountered in the street, parks, & other public places. Use of alcohol was common, but illicit drug use less so. Further, 33% of the patients had histories of treatment for sexually transmitted diseases other than AIDS. These alarmingly high rates of AIDS risk behavior point to the need for assessing AIDS risk & imparting practical knowledge on AIDS to the chronically mental ill patient, as well as counseling about problem solving & assertiveness to prevent risky behavior. 2 Tables. The density of social ties in this core region was about 0.01, & the average number of steps (along shortest paths) between HIV-infected persons & others in the connected core was quite small (between 4 & 6). Ways that the concepts & methods of network analysis can lead to a better understanding of factors affecting the spread of infectious agents transmitted in the course of close or intimate personal contact, in turn leading to more effective disease control strategies, are discussed. 2 Tables, 1 Figure, 7 References. ¶ In a review of safety & health trends in the South African mining industry, considered are: accident & disaster trends; compensation for occupational injuries; trends in occupational diseases; inadequacies in the current South African compensation system; the emergence of safety & health as an industrial relations issue, focusing on the demands for better working conditions by the National Union of Mineworkers; attempts by the state, particularly the mines inspectorate, to contain conflict over safety & health issues & to protect the interests of employers; & employer responses to safety & health. It is concluded that the migrant labor system has covered up the extent of occupational disease & adequacy of working conditions, & that more studies of occupational disease among black mineworkers are needed. 7 Tables, 15 Figures, 29 References. ¶ Pediatricians, parents, & policymakers all want to do what is best for children, but judgments are difficult when medical uncertainties prevail, eg, those surrounding clinical treatment of children for HIV/AIDS (human immunodeficiency virus/acquired immune deficiency syndrome). Several problems are noted: drug testing in child-size doses is uncommon, due to scarce funding & limits on consent; the harm:benefit ratios are not adequately understood; & particular problems result for adolescents because they are too old for pediatric protocols (at age 13) & too young for adult protocols (at age 18). Moreover, HIV/AIDS affects children worldwide, so access to the benefits of new drugs & risk-sharing of unproven methods must be considered in the global context. M. Maguire

¶ The extent to which stigma toward & willingness to interact with persons with AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) is affected by knowledge of disease transmission is assessed. Completion of the AIDS Risk Knowledge Test, the Social Interaction Scale, & the Prejudicial Evaluation Scales by 619 undergraduates at a midsized southeastern university reveals that the average participant answered the knowledge test with 75% accuracy & reported low stigma toward & moderate willingness to interact with persons with AIDS–though more so among women than men. The highest levels of stigma attachment & premeditated avoidance were reserved for those who contacted the disease via high-risk behavior (sexual contact or drug use), rather than through lower-risk behavior (blood transfusions). Finally, those with the greatest knowledge about the disease were found to be the least likely to stigmatize or avoid AIDS patients. 1 Table, 14 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The attitudes of people on the Pacific coast of Colombia toward the locally-operating malaria control program are examined through household questionnaires, interviews (N = 4,454), & participant observation, combined with a serological survey on the incidence of malaria attacks & prevalence of antibodies. Results show that people incorporate modern & traditional elements into their concepts of malaria & treatment strategies. Deficiencies of the official control programs are shown from the people's point of view. Human factors that influence malaria transmission are discussed & an estimate of the accuracy of self-diagnosis is presented. 9 Figures, 26 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Data obtained during 25 indepth interviews with college students ages 17-22 in Montreal, Quebec, are drawn on to examine the social construction of acquired immune deficiency syndrome transmission & prevention. The content of common sense knowledge, its relationship to scientifically based safer-sex guidelines, & the strategies used by young adults to construct their reality of human immunodeficiency virus (HIV) transmission & prevention are described. Results indicate that a single rule of HIV protection predominated: protection through selection of uninfected partners; the implementation of this rule varied based on gender & sexual experience. The gender based rules & roles reflect a continuing double standard with respect to sexual acitivity that results in differences in men's & women's ability to protect themselves & in the content of constructed safer-sex strategies. Implications of these findings for educational policy are discussed. 49 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The increasing trend to strengthen & display cultural identity, particularly among women who have migrated from rural areas, is investigated, focusing on Arab-American women in Calif & based in part on personal experience. It is argued that these women, who live between two cultures, are at high risk for physical & mental distress as a product of the conflict between the expectations & values of the country of origin & the host country. Health care professionals' views of immigrants often exacerbate the stress & support immigrants' perceptions of being misunderstood. Common principles that can guide & enhance understanding of these women are identified: direct involvement in the targeted population, a focus on the lived experience of participants, & consideration of both the satisfying & stressful aspects of immigrant women's bicultural roles. ¶ A review essay on a book by Troyen Brennan, Just Doctoring: Medical Ethics in the Liberal State (Berkeley: U of California Press, 1991 (see listing in IRPS No. 66)). This book notes that the traditional medical ethic emphasizes physician loyalty to patients, ignoring larger considerations of society, & argues for a wider-scope medical ethic called "just doctoring." Grounded in a public morality of liberalism, this ethic consists of three elements: (1) disavowal of paternalism, & respect for the autonomy of patients; (2) disavowal of efforts to control ethics & patients' desires for greater autonomy & equality, & general consideration of society's economic & institutional concerns; & (3) altruism, as evidenced by commitment to all patients, rather than only to those having a contractual arrangement. The impacts of the medical ethic of liberalism on such subjects as informed consent, quality of care, & health care rationing are discussed. D. Generoli

¶ The medicalization of poorly defined health disorders has led to increased promotion of medications & remedies for personal & social problems, eg, male pattern baldness, mental fatigue, small breasts, tension, stress, & obesity. Biomedical explanations for certain common symptoms are often vague, prompting consumers to seek solutions for problems perceived to be related to optimum health & well-being. Instead of choosing the health care system, consumers frequently decide to self-medicate based on their perceptions of worsening symptoms & their social knowledge about health & illness. When such problems are medicalized, a medication that may originate from fringe health-care companies is used for symptomatic relief. 1 Table, 5 Figures, 43 References. Based on intensive observation of & interviews with medical resident physicians (MDs) at 3 teaching hospitals caring for 55 terminally ill patients, a grounded theory approach was used to determine situations in which a limited code was chosen. Moral dilemmas facing the resident MD who disagreed with either the family or the attending senior MD on the necessity to prolong life in cases where they were convinced that resuscitation would prove futile are discussed. Ethical issues surrounding patient autonomy & the requirement for a joint decision to resuscitate are also considered. 66 References. Adapted from the source document. The low prevalence rate of the virus among the general population makes the cost of a program to screen the population at large very high. Since screening has little point unless there are follow-up activities to reduce the continued spread of HIV, a modeling framework is presented for determination of optimal policy alternatives after screening. 3 Tables, 3 Figures, 1 Appendix, 22 References. Questionnaire &/or interview data obtained from 7 sample groups ranging from high school students to business proprietors (total N = 2,000) indicate that AIDS is spreading throughout Kenya, & that adults & adolescents alike are aware of the disease, but not of the means to prevent it. The Kenyan government has had little to say about the presence of AIDS for fear of jeopardizing the tourist industry. ¶ Interviews with 1,250 Canadian adults about public knowledge & policy attitudes on HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) infection & AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome), as well as personal sexual practices, showed relatively high knowledge of AIDS & HIV infection. Most Canadians' attitudes on policy issues related to AIDS were fairly liberal: persons with HIV should be protected from discrimination in housing & employment, & anonymous HIV testing was supported. However, they were more conservative when it came to supporting medical intervention to stop the spread of AIDS. Attitudes toward AIDS were strongly correlated with general views about civil liberties & gays & lesbians. Per regression analyses, people who were more knowledgeable about AIDS were not more likely to have tolerant attitudes, but having more tolerant attitudes led people to become more knowledgeable. The risk of contracting AIDS was calculated for respondents based on the number of sexual partners & frequency of unprotected sex. Knowledge increased with age & with having gay or lesbian friends; however, knowledge did not deter people from taking risks. 7 Tables, 1 Figure, 14 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ The long-term health care implications of the AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) epidemic are addressed from a futurist perspective, with focus on tax policy, hospital support, federal research policy, & Medicare/Medicaid. It is speculated that the AIDS epidemic could exhaust resources & thereby help trigger national reform, potentially hastening the paradigm shift that is occurring throughout the health care system. Implications of AIDS that go beyond health care are also examined, including issues relating to the right of privacy among AIDS sufferers & how this is threatened by future information systems that could make discrimination based on medical records a nightmare. Though potentially threatening, these information systems also offer the hope of accelerating progress against not only AIDS but other major health threats as well. Policy implications for dealing with the epidemic are discussed, & suggestions for how futurists can best respond to the challenge of AIDS are offered. 1 Table. Adapted from the source document. ¶ To investigate the state of health of immigrant women laborers, interview data were obtained from Yugoslav women (N = 155) working in West Berlin, Germany. Analysis reveals a high incidence of various maladies for the given age distribution. In general, their health worsened with increased time spent working in Germany. Also, high production quotas lead to great physical stress; additional problems result from a large amount of time spent caring for a family, from insecure economic positions, & from limited prospects for improvement. Frequent illnesses include nervous, locomotor, cardiac, & circulatory problems. ¶ Secondary statistical data are drawn on to discuss health & medical care in Ghana in terms of broader issues of development & underdevelopment. Ghana's dependent, peripheral standing has created a serious bottleneck in the domestic economy. The mounting debt crisis & the need to respond to International Monetary Fund policies on economic stabilization have worsened precarious health resources. Comment, 25-33, Response, 35-37.
¶ One dimension of competition present in the Medicare physician (MD) market is assessed by examining whether beneficiaries are willing to switch to the Participating Physicians' (PAR) Program, established in 1984 to persuade MDs to accept assignment more often. Based on telephone survey data for a stratified random sample of 1,994 people in the national Medicare population drawn in Oct 1988, findings indicate that beneficiaries are not sensitive to price when making decisions about whether or not to switch MDs. More importantly, willingness to switch was not correlated with ability to pay. However, beneficiaries who could define the PAR program were more willing to switch to a PAR MD, implying that better information might encourage successful market competition. It is concluded that the use of the price mechanism to channel beneficiaries to particular MDs would be ineffective. In Can Consumer Choice Reward Quality and Economy? Towards a Test of Economic Competition, Richard Kronick (U of California, San Diego, La Jolla) argues that the evidence that Medicare beneficiaries are not sensitive to unit prices charged by MDs is not persuasive. Further, figuring out the extent to which Medicare beneficiaries consider the unit price of services when choosing a MD provides little information about whether policies aimed at altering consumer demand can successfully control Medicare costs. Suggestions for Medicare policy changes that would provide a test of whether demand-side strategies can be successfully used to improve the quality & economy of care delivered to Medicare beneficiaries are offered. In Response to Richard Kronick, Rice et al contend that their conclusions are a valid interpretation of the data, that they used an adequate test of economic competition (choice of cost-effective MDs), & that a test of the procompetition model, as recommended by Kronick, is inappropriate for the medical care marketplace. 5 Tables, 20 References. It is argued that these changes have resulted in flaws in coverage, give authority to health care providers to withdraw care, do not provide for a method of health status evaluation, & are inconsistent with federal law in many respects. The Ore Medicaid experiment will require federal approval & poses the ethically significant question of health care rationing for the poor. D. ¶ The possibility that HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) detection among psychiatric inpatients is hampered by patients too disturbed or too distrustful to give informed consent or to reveal risk factors is explored. The actual number of HIV-positive patients in an acute-care facility in Manhattan (New York City), Nov 1989-May 1990, was determined through serological testing & a review of medical records. Serological testing determined that 25 of the 350 blood samples available from hospital admissions procedures were infected with HIV; 10 of the 25 were not serologically tested during admission; & 8 of the 10 patients were discharged without having had serological testing at all. In addition, 39 of the 77 inpatients whose admission records identified HIV-related risk behaviors were likewise released without having been serologically tested. Challenges to this construction of AIDS, emerging largely from lesbian & gay activists, offer glimpses, in an incipient form, of a politics of "health from below" that locates the struggle for health as part of the fight for control over our bodies & our lives. ¶ An analysis of secondary data is used to show how the Rockefeller Foundation's campaign against yellow fever in Mexico, 1921-1923, successfully sought to advance the economic & political interests of the US. Implemented at a time of strong anti-American sentiment in Mexico, the doctors become diplomats for the US, while at the same time stopping the spread of yellow fever to the US. Techniques used by the Foundation challenged the anti-American sentiments of the Mexican people & set in place the foundation of the Mexican health care system. 6 Tables, 1 Figure, 101 References. ¶ Yugoslav & other immigrant workers suffer from many physical ailments already eradicated from the native population of the host country, eg, tuberculosis & other infectious & parasitic diseases. Many such workers become disabled. Rheumatism & circulatory disorders are common. Women suffer from poor work conditions & family responsibilities. Preventive measures are often neglected, & complicated pregnancies occur. Unsurprisingly, perinatal mortality is higher & children are more often beset with serious sickness among immigrant families. When the father is absent, women take on additional roles, further exacerbating the situation. Both women working abroad & those who return to Yugoslavia face considerable health problems. 1 Table, 11 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Medical reform during the Victorian era in GB was characterized by acute & protracted intraprofessional conflict. The traditional tripartite professional structure of physicians, surgeons, & apothecaries was evolving into a bipartite division between elite hospital consultants & general practioners. Explored here is the hypothesis that rival professional interests were expressed in the different configurations of knowledge on which competing claims to status & authority were based. Whereas the elite either held aloof or invoked the civilized "gentlemanly" science of John Hunter, the general practitioner was more disposed to embrace the more radical "democratic" sciences, eg, phrenology & the new morphology. The most significant finding was that the children of uneducated mothers died 3 times more often during the first month of life than those of mothers with 9+ years of education. Respondents (Rs) were asked to evaluate the moral & legal status of 8 acts in relation to 1 terminal & 2 nonterminal cases, & to report their own willingness to perform the acts. Findings indicate a higher acceptance of assisted suicide vs euthanasia, & higher acceptance of both for terminal vs nonterminal cases. Rs with strong religious beliefs or conservative political attitudes were generally less supportive of aid in dying than nonbelievers & Rs with more radical political views. 4 Tables, 1 Appendix, 26 References. ¶ Examined is the impact of a community health promotion program on 6 extant Minnesota Heart Health Programs (MHHP) in ND, Minn, SD, & Wisc. The effectiveness of the promotion program is evaluated to determine whether an enhanced health promotion delivery system had developed in MHHP communities by the end of the intervention period or whether the intervention had suppressed community efforts. Nine areas of health promotion are assessed, including smoking cessation, heart disease education, chemical dependency education, stress management, cancer education, & home safety. Data were gathered in separate surveys of 438 community organization providers & at 320 larger worksites in the 6 MHHP communities. Results show: no suppression of health promotion delivery systems; a greater participation in heart disease health promotion & greater social connectedness among worksites in intervention communities; & that institutionalization may be more likely in stable organizations whose current needs & interests fit the goals of the intervention activity. 6 Tables, 50 References. ¶ While the number of cases & the death rate from pellagra in Italy fell rapidly beginning in the early 1880s, the number of deaths rose in the late 1880s & remained high for nearly 20 years. This paradox demonstrates the interaction of rapid population growth with a transformation of the production process. Pellagra shifted from northern to central regions, plains to mountains, new to old cases, day laborers to sharecroppers, & economic dynamism to stagnation. The pellagra case illustrates the importance of historical economic, ecological, demographic, & political forces in the anthropological understanding of human health. ¶ Table, 1 Figure, 76 References. ¶ Data obtained through fieldwork conducted 1969-present in eastern Uganda are drawn on to describe how the deterioration of government health services since 1971 has been accompanied by a process of privatization that has made pharmaceuticals readily available outside of biomedical institutions. This development is analyzed in terms of the "sector model" of health care systems, with special attention to the relations between the professional & folk sectors. Folk practitioners of pharmaceutical medicine include a broad range of specialists, from government trained paramedicals in private practice to vendors bringing medicine to local markets. Like other folk specialists, they respect the customer's opinion, provide treatment by proxy, & adjust their services to the customer's ability to pay. Although there are negative aspects of this development, from the local point of view there are also positive ones, which deserve the consideration of health planners. 41 References. ¶ An overview is given of factors shaping physicians' (MDs') behavior in (the former) East Germany before & after national reunification. Special attention is given to the impact of institutional structures in outpatient clinics, staffing, time management, motivation, & stress on the behavior of general MDs. Also discussed are differences between the actual & expressed needs of patients. In 1988, the average East German visited the MD 10 times with an average visit length of only 6 minutes. It is expected that patients & MDs will need to switch from an institution-oriented to a more personal approach as the privatization of medical practice proceeds. 5 References. ¶ It is argued that the prevalence of AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) in the UK is substantially underrepresented in extant national AIDS data, which poses significant problems for health educators. The future impact of AIDS in the UK is discussed, as are social & sociological responses to the AIDS/HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) crisis. It is misguided to assume that the protective strategies developed by gay males are readily available for adoption by heterosexuals who are differentiated by gender, age, & relative amounts of social power. It is maintained that sociological research has not made an adequate contribution to the development of AIDS intervention strategies. Analysis of the empirical literature on lay concepts of health & illness reveals a pessimistic attitude on the part of some researchers regarding the ability of individuals to modify behavior, though a more positive appraisal of some of the literature is possible. Health education & sociological research can contribute to the control of AIDS by assisting in the development of strategies of empowerment. 3 Tables, 2 Figures, 65 References. ¶ To assess the effects of health behaviors, independent of the effects of health status, on perceived quality of life (QoL), questionnaires & physical readiness tests were administered to 5,082 randomly selected US Navy personnel (89% men; average age 28) in 1986. As expected, health variables were significantly related to QoL: self-assessed health & fitness status & fewer physical symptoms accounted for 16%-18% of the variance in QoL; after controlling for health status, health behavior measures contributed an additional 6%-11% of the variance. It is concluded that health behaviors influence QoL independently of health status. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 3 Appendixes, 33 References. Adapted from the source document.

In The Nature of Care, Emily K. Abel (School of Public Health, U of California, Los Angeles) suggests that the worthiness of the book–which quantifies the extent to which Americans volunteer in different programs while qualitatively exploring their underlying motivations for doing so–is found in its rich & extensive interviews, but also notes that the work suffers from three flaws, ie, failing to: examine who volunteers, include the two largest groups of caregivers (family members of the sick & workers whose job includes caregiving), & draw from feminist scholarship on the issue. Paul D. Allison (U of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia), in Altruism versus Individualism, contends that the quantitative findings are insightfully enhanced by the qualitative analyses. Moreover, the books's accessibility makes it useful reading for those interested in altruistic behavior &/or in US society, although it is conceded that the book could more adequately situate itself within the field. ¶ Data from pathologists' registers are used to examine suicides among youth ages 10-19 in Newfoundland & Labrador, 1977-1988. A suicide rate of 4.37 per 100,000 is established, lower than the official figures but higher than the rate reported in other studies of Newfoundland. The suicide rate of males is 5 times that of females, & the rate of people ages 15-19 is 6 times that of people ages 10-14. Rates are highest in Labrador, especially among natives in northern areas, & highest on Saturdays. Firearms account for 55% of the suicides, & hangings for 33%. Suicides were incorrectly reported on death certificates in 27 of the 63 cases, indicating why it is problematic to rely on official statistics; reasons for this underreporting are discussed. 4 Tables, 25 References. ¶ The pivotal distinction between the stressful consequences of social organization & the stressful antecedents of psychological disorder concern whether the occurrence of stressors is viewed as socially determined, or as independent of social placement. Recent research is evaluated regarding the social distribution of stress & social variation in response to stress. Two particularly productive areas of inquiry are also reviewed: self-efficacy as a mediator between social position & stress; & the intersection of macro- & microstress processes in economic & occupational spheres, with emphasis on gender stratification. It is concluded that the occurrence of systemic stressors is not necessarily an indication of a social system run amok but may reflect instead the system functioning precisely as it is supposed to function. 126 References. ¶ Major psychosocial changes affecting homosexual men diagnosed as HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) seropositive, including multiple, chronic, uncontrollable stressors, & losses in familiar sources of social support, may overwhelm previously learned coping strategies, resulting in a loss of perceived self-efficacy, feelings of hopelessness & depression, & increases in maladaptive behaviors. These sequelae may, in turn, compromise future mental & physical health status. It is suggested that this population may benefit substantially from behavioral interventions that increase self-efficacy, encourage emotional expression & adaptive coping, & increase social support resources in a supportive group environment, thereby decreasing the likelihood of distress & depression, sexual risk behaviors, & substance use, with potential benefits as well for immunologic status & clinical health. Recent work, though preliminary, supports the utility of such behavioral interventions; further larger-scale investigations are warranted. 1 Figure, 201 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The characteristics of chronic posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) & of individuals who suffer from it are investigated based on scale & interview data obtained from a random sample of 1,007 members ages 21-30 of a large health maintenance organization in Detroit, Mich, of whom 394 reported traumatic events, & 93 met criteria for PTSD. Findings reveal that 50% of the PTSD-diagnosed respondents (Rs) had experienced symptoms for a year or longer, & were defined as having chronic PTSD. Compared to those with nonchronic PTSD, chronic PTSD Rs were more likely to experience psychological & physiological overreactivity to stimuli symbolic of the traumatic events, as well as interpersonal numbing. Chronic PTSD was also associated with greater prevalence of anxiety, affective disorders, & various medical conditions. Early separation from parents, family history of anxiety, preexisting anxiety or depression, & neuroticism were predictors of PTSD of either duration category, & family history of antisocial behavior & female gender with chronic PTSD. Prospective studies in which risk factors are measured before the onset of disease are needed to guard against the potentially biasing effects of a history of psychiatric disorder on Rs' reports about risk factors. 5 Tables, 19 References. ¶ Described is the use of discourse analysis for studying the composition of psychological case reports in terms of their rhetorical features. The coherence of case reports is dealt with mainly in terms of substantive logic, which consists in identifying & interrelating the component statements of one or more arguments used to explain a case. Practical suggestions are made about analyzing arguments with the help of a word processor. Local cohesion in normal linear text also affects comprehension; diagrams & hypertext are mentioned. Factors affecting the production of a case report include the reporter's expertise & the difficulty of the task. The reporter's understanding of, & ability to deal with, a case are likely to be modified in the process of reflecting on & revising a report; thus, preparing a case report is an exercise in problem solving. Both feature psychiatrists as narrators & protagonists who must grapple with questions about the value of pain to the individual, as well as conflict between what is good for the individual vs for society. While Shaffer suggests that the loss of individualism is a foregone conclusion, Percy focuses on the possibility that the individual might prevail. Both works raise issues related to responsibility, rights, & goals, & touch on some of the broad social issues that are an integral part of modern technology. L. Dorn

Comments, 77-100, Response, 101-106.

¶ A challenge is raised to the common assumption in cross-cultural psychiatry that schizophrenia has a better prognosis in the Third World than in Western industrialized societies. Extant theory & empirical research are briefly reviewed, & an indepth critique offered of Nancy E. Waxler's research in Sri Lanka ("Is Outcome for Schizophrenia Better in Nonindustrial Societies? The Case of Sri Lanka," Journal of Nervous & Mental Diseases, 1979, 167, 144-158), focusing on sampling bias, the unreliability of hospital-based & follow-up studies, & the effects of social labeling theory. Implications for the intepretation of other cross-cultural studies on schizophrenia are discussed, & suggestions offered for methodological improvements. In Commentary on Cohen, Prognosis for Schizophrenia in the Third World, Nancy Waxler-Morrison (U of British Columbia, V6T 1B2 Vancouver) agrees with Cohen's call for detailed ethnographic research on the social context of mental illness & attention to sampling problems, & raises additional issues concerning the theory used to inform research methods in nonindustrialized societies. In Commentary on Prognosis for Schizophrenia in the Third World, by Alex Cohen, Norman Sartorius (World Health Organization, CH-1211 Geneva, Switzerland) contends that Cohen's review of other research conducted by the World Health Organization is only cursory, & calls for greater collaboration. In Commentary on Cohen, Prognosis for Schizophrenia in the Third World, Richard Warner (Mental Health Center of Boulder County, 1333 Iris Ave, Colo 80304) argues that the degree of difference in recovery rates from schizophrenia between the First & Third World is too great to be diminished by minor methodological concerns, & suggests that the actual reason may lie in different definitions of the condition. In Cervantes' Puzzle--A Commentary on Alex Cohen's "Prognosis for Schizophrenia in the Third World: A Reevaluation of Cross-Cultural Research," Kim Hopper (Nathan Kline Instit for Psychiatric Research, Orangeburg NY 10962) explores some limitations of Cohen's criticisms relevant to sampling bias & informant reliability, & raises larger questions concerning cross-cultural incidence rates of psychiatric disorders, labeling effects, the role of work & family relations in schizophrenics' recovery, & quality of ethnographic data. In Response to the Invited Commentaries, Cohen reiterates his arguments, addresses concerns about informant reliability & sampling bias, & emphasizes the value of ethnographic methods in cross-cultural studies of schizophrenia. 71 References. ¶ Standard psychiatric interpretation suggests that the reasons for homelessness among the mentally ill differ from reasons why mentally healthy people are homeless. The mentally ill are considered victims of both their illness & deinstitutionalization. Here, an alternative explanation proposes a socioeconomic & political contextualization of causes for homelessness. It dismisses the illusory distinction between homeless mentally ill & mentally ill homeless as fallacious on empirical & strategic grounds. Among contributing factors to the impoverishment & disenfranchisement of the homeless mentally ill are the rapid decline in available low-cost housing, the loss of manufacturing jobs, & reduction of social welfare entitlements. Similar life history & demographic features are noted for both classes of homeless. The crisis of homelessness generates multiple stressors, both physical & mental, regardless of initial state of mental health. Instead of a clinical solution, it is suggested that psychiatry focus on context, entitlement, consumerism, empowerment, community-level intervention, & homeless rights advocacy. 86 References. ¶ The relationship between substance use & posttraumatic stress disorder (PTSD) is examined, using interview data obtained from 2,663 residents of St. Louis, Mo, in 1982, & again in 1983. Of the respondents (Rs), 430 reported a traumatic event that could qualify for PTSD, but only 1.35% actually suffered from PTSD. Findings reveal an increasing relationship between use of more addictive drugs (eg, opiates or cocaine) & reports of events that lead to PTSD, as well as vulnerability to PTSD once exposed. Substance users in general were not more likely than nonusers to experience a certain type of stressor; however, contrasting specific types of users showed that cocaine/opiate users were more likely to experience a physical attack. Cocaine/opiate users were less likely than alcoholics to report combat-related events leading to PTSD. Female gender & use of cocaine/opiates predicted PTSD when other variables, including antisocial behavior, were controlled. Nightmares, jumpiness, & sleep problems were the most prevalent symptoms reported. Recommendations are made for future research. 4 Tables, 3 Figures, 18 References. S. Millett

¶ Interview data gathered over 2 years from 169 people diagnosed with severe, persistent mental illnesses are used to investigate the kinds of ideas individuals invoke to account for themselves as mentally ill, how or if these explanations influence the way they lead their lives, & whether the person who resists the attribution of mental illness safeguards an unspoiled identity & retains access to normal functioning. Explanations & descriptions of mental illness & propensities to self-label are shown to be interrelated in a multidirectional, multidimensional manner. The discourse of individuals in the cohort is pervaded with normalizing talk & illness accounts that are both patterned & diverse, as well as stable & variable over time. Sociocultural factors, particularly race, gender, & type of illness explanation have a stronger correlation with self-labeling than clinical factors, eg, formal diagnosis. As a means to explore self & sickness among persons with chronic illnesses, the concepts of illness-identity work & illness-identity talk are developed. 3 Tables, 7 Figures, 79 References. ¶ A review of the evolution in quantitative research during the first ten years of the AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) epidemic, highlighting the importance of involvement of the brain in HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) infection. It is now known that the brain is infected very early on & that cerebral pathology occurs in approximately 90% of patients who have died of AIDS. Diseases affecting the brain are described, including opportunistic infections, neoplasms, & pathology directly induced by HIV. The significance of these neuropathological abnormalities is explored by correlating them with clinical findings, & the importance of recent studies of brain cell population changes is addressed, especially in clarifying HIV-induced neuronal loss & theories of its possible mechanisms. 2 Tables, 91 References. ¶ An examination of the community treatment order debate in England & Wales as a historical development of supervisory powers over mentally disordered community-residing patients. After outlining the background of compulsory community powers, which expands on the strict community power of guardianship over detained patients, the attempts made by psychiatrists to improvise a community treatment order for nonrestricted patients following passage of the Mental Health Act of 1959 are detailed. Orginally intended to provide psychiatrists powers to require a community-detained patient to continue taking medications, a 1986 High Court decision ruled against such broad powers, with potential for abuse. Barring the unlikely event of legislation on community powers, recent common law developments have contributed to a juridification of such specific powers. The possible form of future community treatment orders is discussed in the context of the European Convention on Human Rights' legal doctrine & the Law Commission's consideration of decision-making criteria vs incapacity. ¶ An investigation of whether the etiology of preferred partner sex among pedophiles is related to that of preferred partner sex among males preferring adult partners. Using phallometric test sensitivities to calculate the proportion of true pedophiles among various groups of sex offenders against children (total N = 465), & taking into consideration previously reported mean numbers of victims per offender group, the ratio of heterosexual to homosexual pedophiles was caluculated to be approximately 11:1. It is concluded that the resulting proportion of true pedophiles among persons with a homosexual erotic development is greater than that in persons who develop heterosexually. This does not indicate, however, that androphilic males have a greater propensity to offend against children. 2 Tables, 27 References. Adapted from the source document.

The modern coroner in England has two functions that are in potential conflict during an inquest: neutral fact finding for the state vs moral amplification. There is no official definition of death; such definitions are produced through a moral analysis of facts surrounding a death & demarcating them from those surrounding other, more culpable deaths. The neglect of accidental death in sociology study is considered, & future research directions are suggested. 26 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Previous research has demonstrated that among Hispanics, the family is viewed as the primary caregiver for seriously mentally ill members.

Here, families' conceptions of serious mental illness, of their interaction with mental health resources, & on the burdens experienced by families in caring for a seriously mentally ill member are examined, focusing on Hispanic families, with some comparative data from black & European ethnic group families. Data obtained via indepth interviews & primary caregivers in 90 families in NJ demonstrate the importance of concepts of nervios (nerves) & fallo mental (mental failure) in shaping families' reponses to their ill family member, as well as the role of social support systems for families, particularly religious institutions & religious healing. 3 Tables, 54 References. ¶ Data from the Dept of Mental Health for 579 patients discharged from a state-operated acute psychiatric hospital in a midwestern city, 1987/88, are examined to assess the relationship between length of stay (LOS) diagnosis, ethnicity, & gender. ¶ An exploration of the powerful ethical dilemma for mental health professionals regarding whether to provide mental health treatment to prisoners under death sentence who have been judged incompetent for execution. It is contended that the decision should depend on the nature of the treatment, its goals, the standard for competency for execution, & the prisoner's ability & willingness to consent to treatment. Arguments against treatment include: the obligation to protect the welfare of the patient, the adverse impact on the clinician, the public's potentially unfavorable perception of mental health professionals, & allocation of limited resources. Arguments for treating the incompetent include: the right of the prisoner to be treated, the low risk of harm in most forms of treatment, & the adverse impact of selective refusal to treat certain patients in mental health institutions. It is concluded that treatment decisions should be made on an individual basis. 53 References. S. Millett (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ A cross-disciplinary examination of assumptions & findings in international psychiatric epidemiology, particularly those pertaining to differential outcome for schizophrenia, is presented. Drawing heavily on World Health Organization (WHO) studies of schizophrenia now spanning over a quarter century, the analysis also scrutinizes the anthropological challenges to that record, & suggests avenues for an ethnographic corrective. The WHO studies illuminate both achievements & shortcomings of large-scale psychiatric epidemiology. While their logistical & technical advances have received well-deserved praise, criticisms of the studies include: charges of ethnocentrism & category errors in the psychiatric research enterprise itself, translation difficulties, the suspect quality of questionnaire-generated accounts of illness, & the naivete of treating culture as a set of variables. It is argued that not all of these objections are well-founded; both persisting cross-cultural puzzles & the emerging picture of Western clinical complexity virtually demand sustained ethnographic inquiry if they are to be examined further. It is suggested that, ironically, it appears to be practicing clinicians & their ethnographic collaborators, not the cross-cultural epidemiologists or their anthropological critics, who recognize this convergence of interests & are capitalizing on it. 1 Table, 151 References. ¶ An investigation of racial differences in admission rates for children & adolescents into state mental health correctional facilities in NY during 1988. Classified by ethnicity, age, gender, & referral source, admission rates were compared for black, white, & Hispanic youth ages 10-18 (total N = 2,879). While population-adjusted admission rates for mental health facilities showed parity among the races, black youth were vastly overrepresented in the juvenile correctional system. Differences in judicial attitudes toward institutionalized control were reflected in court referrals placing every youthful offender in detention, whereas only 17% of youth in mental health facilities were placed by court order. It is concluded that results do not support a racial bias in admissions to the child & adolescent public mental health system in NY. 1 Figure, 22 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Esteem maintenance & impression management are examined as two motivational explanations for depressive realism & nondepressive illusions of control, using experimental data obtained from 219 psychology students at Northwestern U (Evanston, Ill). After measuring Ss' self-esteem & perception of the relation between self-esteem & control, both depressed & nondepressed Ss (as determined by the Beck Depression Inventory & Multiple Affect Adjective Checklist) were asked to perform a "judgment of control" task in either a public or private setting. Results indicate that control judgments are a function of both social context & esteem-maintenance needs, & that the differences between the depressed

& nondepressed are most pronounced when both measures are high. Although evidence relates each motivational process to judgments of control, neither process could completely explain responses, which suggests the need to examine nonmotivational explanations as well. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 50 References. ¶ A review of the literature on the nature, complexity, & treatment of social phobia & avoidant personality disorder. It is argued that the severity of social phobia has been underestimated, & that it can result in significant impairment. The co-occurrence of other psychopathology is discussed. Information on the etiology of the disorders is scant, but lends some support to the view that a general biological vulnerability may be inherited & interact with environmental factors, though these factors are not well elaborated. The treatment-outcome literature is limited, & while there is some evidence of the impact of the pharmacotherapies, a return of the disorder on cessation of the medication is also documented. While there is evidence that exposure therapy, cognitive therapy, & social skills training all exert positive effects on the disorder, the clinical significance of these effects seems inadequate. 2 Tables, 50 References. ¶ In academic settings, psychiatry has played a predominantly curative rather than proleptic role, since psychiatrists tend to employ the biomedical rather than the biopsychosocial mode of therapy. As such, they may overlook sociogenic factors associated with emotional dysfunction & are likely to medicalize & individualize problems that are more social in origin. Their methods are predominantly reductionistic & mechanistic, approaches based on assumptions that contradict the educational ideal of autonomy. In contrast, clinical psychologists, counselors, social workers, & sociological practitioners employ nonmedical forms of therapy that may be more acceptable to university students than medication, which implies illness. Is is argued that psychiatrists working in academic settings should limit their services to serious cases of dysfunction in which biological factors are clearly implicated, & that such medical/psychiatric treatment should be provided on the basis of liaison or consultation. 51 References. ¶ Drawing on recent demographic changes in the US family, an analysis of the feminization of psychotherapy professionals suggests that, beyond change in remunerativeness or status, gender transposition will cause a far greater transformation in the profession. The actual character of the work of psychotherapy may change, given the departure of men & the influx of women, mirroring larger changes regarding men's & women's relative responsibility in society for providing intimacy. It is argued that men's abandonment of psychotherapy as a profession exacerbated the commonly held belief that women, not men, are responsible for tending to & ameliorating emotional pain & psychological problems. This process portends a greater bifurcation in our social lives along gender lines, where women numerically dominate occupations that can be viewed as extensions of their traditional roles within the family. Such labor force segregation robs society of an institution in which men traditionally have involved themselves in emotion work, & in tolerating & immersing themselves in the intimate & messy problems experienced daily. 16 References. ¶ While it has been demonstrated that the demand for health services, including mental health services, has dramatically increased over the past thirty years, the ways in which demand varies among ethnic subpopulations has not been documented. As policy decisions about access to care & deferment of costs assume increasing social importance, this neglected component of demand is key to equitable decisionmaking. Following a literature review, data obtained from 3,175 Federal Employee Health Benefit Plan contracts, which were serviced by Blue Cross 1979-1981 (copayments increased by 20%-30% for 1981), reveal striking differences in utilization of outpatient & inpatient mental health services among blacks, Hispanics, & whites. It is found that whites utilize outpatient services most & inpatient services least, while blacks demonstrate the opposite tendencies. Determining the factors that account for these systematic variations, whether cultural, societal, economic, or other, remains a task of future research. 3 Tables, 81 References. M. Maguire

Supporting labeling theory, Rs rejected the mentally ill significantly more than identically behaving physically ill persons. Rs also considered the mentally ill as less predictable & as having less positive outcomes than those with physical illness. ¶ Police handling of the mentally ill is examined, describing the decisionmaking framework used to manage deinstitutionalized mentally ill persons. Police officers were observed in routine interactions with citizens in a large midwestern US city over 14 months during 1980/81. Of 2,122 citizens observed, 85 were judged by the observer to be mentally disordered. The arrest rate for the mentally ill is nearly double that of non-ill persons because arrest is often the only disposition available; hospitalization was initiated for only 13.3% of the mentally ill suspects. Multiply impaired persons (substance abuse or criminality combined with mental disorder) are more likely to be arrested because of the overall organization of the mental health care delivery system. Police officers' decisions to hospitalize, arrest, or informally manage a mentally ill citizen are based less on the degree of psychiatric symptomalogy than on the sociopsychological & structural factors pertinent to each situation. Overall, formal dispositions–hospitalization or arrest–were made when police felt that the situation was likely to escalate & require subsequent police assistance. 2 Tables, 41 References. AA

¶ The effect of the presence of native Indian populations on the consumption level of alcohol is assessed through sales data from 600 Liquor Control Board outlets for spirits & wine & 466 Brewers Retail outlets in 48 counties of Ontario, & with 1986 census data. Generally, regions with native Indian reserves had significantly higher alcohol consumption levels than the province as a whole or counties without reserves. As the proportion of the native Indian population increased, the absolute alcohol consumption per person age 15+ also increased. Consumption was significantly higher in the northern counties vs the southern, with or without reserves. Per regression analysis, including income, employment, household crowding, industrialization, northern isolation, & tourism variables, the presence of native reserves explained 60+% of the variance in alcohol consumption. Since improvement in economic circumstances significantly reduced the level of alcohol consumption, it is inferred that community development & the economic dimension are important in reducing native Indian consumption. 4 Tables, 2 Figures, 84 References. ¶ A cultural focus on dieting & ideals of thinness for women have been implicated in the high incidence of anorexia nervosa in Western cultures. Though previous research has found that the majority of nonanorexic women in the US are preoccupied with body weight & dieting, it is not clear what "thinness" means to anorexics themselves or that norms about dieting are always involved in subjective experiences of anorexia. Here, case studies of 2 anorexic women from Minneapolis-Saint Paul, Minn, show that for some anorexics, self-starvation is encoded in religious idioms & symbols about the body, food, & self. A review of the literature illustrates a long-standing relation between self-starvation & religious ideals in Western culture & points to an association between contemporary anorexia nervosa & asceticism. It is suggested that future research formally investigate the religious practices & beliefs of anorexics seen clinically; also recommended is cross-cultural research on asceticism about the body & food in religions other than Judeo-Christian, cultural groups with rituals of fasting & vomiting, & the presence of fundamentalist churches & missionaries in those non-Western cultures with reports of eating disorders. Implications of these findings for definitions of "normality" & "abnormality," key issues in ethnopsychiatry, are also discussed. 107 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Structured questionnaire data are utilized to investigate the relationship between psychiatric disorder & the use of tobacco, alcohol, marijuana, & hard drugs in a sample of 1,302 adolescents ages 12-16 from a stratified random sample of households in Ontario. Symptom checklists were used to approximate diagnoses of conduct, attention deficit disorder, & emotional disorders. Logistic regression analyses indicated that conduct disorder was strongly related to all types of substance use & that emotional disorder was related to the use of tobacco, alcohol, & hard drugs. However, these relationships were true for adolescents' self-assessments only. 6 Tables, 46 References. Abstracted from the source document. ¶ An assessment of the relevance of tobacco, alcohol, marijuana, & other substance use & early adolescent psychiatric disorder in predicting late adolescent substance use, drawing on questionnaire data collected from youth ages 12-16 & the female head-of-household in 1983 & 1987 (total N = 1,869) as part of the Ontario Child Health Study. While results indicate a strong association between substance use in 1983 & 1987, the subsequent use of marijuana & other hard drugs is predicted by only conduct disorder in 1983, after controlling for prior use of hard drugs, & coexisting attention deficit & emotional disorders. In addition, there was a minimal reduction in use of marijuana & hard drugs resulting from early treatment interventions for conduct disorder. 5 Tables, 19 References. ¶ Discussed is the utility of several measures for evaluating the temporal effects of social interventions: log-linear modeling, structural equation modeling, repeated measures analysis of variance, & time-series analysis. The methods are demonstrated using secondary data on the independent & joint effects of methadone maintenance & legal supervision on narcotics use & property crime among 4 groups of heroin addicts (total N = 1,688) in Calif. The multimethod assessment demonstrates that methadone maintenance has both short- & long-term suppressive effects on narcotic use & property crime; complementary findings are revealed for the effects of legal supervision. 1 Table, 4 Figures, 41 References. Brownstein, Henry H., Making Peace in the War on Drugs, Humanity and Society, 1992, 16, 2, May, 217-235.

¶ In a plea for the peace movement advocating reform of national drug policy, the problematic aspects of the enforcement-driven war on drugs in the US are underlined. The decades-long war on drugs has failed to cause reductions in drug trade, abuse, or related violence. The unrealistic & undesirable goal of a drug-free society is the basis for US policy. The explicit enemy in the war on drugs is the drug itself, while the true enemies of the common morality are the drug users & their particular set of values. The peace movement gained legitimacy with the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws, which lobbied for decriminalization of marijuana statutes. Attempts to repress drug trafficking by war tactics is contrary to democratic ideals. The Netherlands provides a model of a democractic society offering a morally authoritative approach to the drug problem that integrates all the resources of a community to reach common solutions. 63 References. ¶ For practitioners to intervene effectively with alcoholic women, it is important to select theories that recognize & target women's unique experiences, problems, & needs. Criteria are presented for selecting such theoretical frameworks, focusing on: (1) the need for empowerment & an internal locus of control; (2) a cognitive restructuring of beliefs, attitudes, & priorities; (3) the awareness of double standards & stigmas applied to women; (4) excessive role conflicts & demands; (5) environmental stresses; (6) acquiring an independent sense of identity, living skills, & adequate resources; & (7) equal sharing of client/practitioner responsibilities toward change. Separate sections on women's drinking patterns & traits, women's roles, & stages of recovery are developed, along with applicable theories for practice situations. 33 References. AA

¶ The psychiatric & neurological effects of solvent inhalation are explored, drawing on interview & case record data for a random sample of 22 patients with chronic histories of solvent abuse, primarily toluene-based solvents, at a hospital in Alberta. Analysis suggests that the chronic inhalation of toluene-based adhesives can produce a paranoid psychosis that may persist; high incidence of temporal lobe epilepsy & decrease in IQ were also exhibited. It is concluded that the psychiatric & neurological sequelae of chronic solvent abuse are serious & potentially irreversible. Implications for health care budgets are discussed, & attention is drawn to the necessity for educational programs in this area. 1 Table, 22 References. Abstracted from the source document.

¶ Although many studies cite ethnicity as a variable in drug use, the relationship between ethnicity & drug use has not been thoroughly examined. A review of the literature shows that these types of studies contain methodological & theoretical problems. Studies of known addicts are self-selecting, but studies using self-report data on drug use contain systematic underreporting. Conceptualization & operationalization of ethnicity have also been a problem. Explanations of variation in drug use due to ethnicity have been confounded by the confusion between ethnicity & race. Cultural & structural aspects of ethnicity at both the individual (eg, ethnic culture retention & ethnic identity) & the collective (eg, ethnic community involvement) are examined as a means to solve these problems. 1 Table, 2 Figures, 99 References. ¶ The social context of alcoholism among working-class Chinese males (Ms) is examined using case files of 70 Chinese Ms & 62 of their significant others from the Chinatown Alcoholism Services in New York City. The typical alcoholic was married, about age 50, born in the People's Republic of China, less than a high school graduate, & working at least 6 days a week. Of the sample, 75% were alcohol dependent, drinking hard liquor slowly & continuously through the day. Three social factors contributed to the alcoholism: the easy access to alcohol through restaurant work; social isolation from US culture & from other Chinese due to long commutes & lack of leisure time; & family problems due to the lack of time to communicate. Chinese wives were very tolerant of their husbands' drinking problems, & coped when the husband lost his job due to alcoholism. In treatment, these patients initially acted with denial & rationalization, & then bargained about reducing alcohol usage. The practitioner needs to focus on the M alcoholic's interaction with family & integration into society. Educating the Chinese community about alcoholism is also recommended so that alcoholics will be less sensitive about the social stigma associated with seeking treatment. 2 Tables, 37 References. ¶ The push for legalization of marijuana rests on the flawed assumptions that current prohibition policies have failed, & that the US public desires a policy shift toward legalization. However, the downward trend in marijuana use in high schools suggests progress in prevention among adolescents, & the US public's increasingly tough stance on currently licit drugs (eg, alcohol) suggests a trend opposite to that of lessened prohibition. It is contended that a "get tough" policy on legal drugs--combined with prevention efforts, eg, school-based intervention, prohibition of smoking on campus, & decreasing the availability of cigarettes in vending machines--offers more promise than legalization. 2 Tables, 16 References. ¶ In the US, ethnic minorities have experienced the overall negative impact of drug abuse much more severely than the general population. Drug abuse legislation has ignored prevalence, frequency of use, impact on health, & cost to society in determining the legal status of drugs, & legislation enforcement has been narrow & focused on minority segments of the population; ie, nonwhites are more likely than whites to be arrested & convicted. It is argued that drug policy must adopt a public health approach--incorporating federal drug regulation of currently illicit drugs, & banning advertising for licit substances--in preventive & enforcement efforts. 37 References. ¶ Speculations are offered on the form & content of drug education programs if drugs were legalized in the US. Legalization would shift the emphasis of drug education to consideration of responsible vs irresponsible drug use, in regard to the drug taken, who is taking it, the amount taken, circumstances surrounding its use, & the means of administration or ingestion. Drug education could focus on reducing the number of drug users, & reducing the harm resulting from misuse. In shifting away from emphasis on abuse only, it can provide models for healthy use. The focus of drug education should not be on the drug, but on the potential user. 17 References. D. Generoli

¶ Social influence & cognitive precursors of adolescent drug use are investigated, testing a structural equation model with self-administered survey data from 1,138 eighth-grade students from 30 schools in Calif & Ore. Results indicate that for nonusers of tobacco, alcohol, & marijuana, low resistance self-efficacy & prodrug social influences directly predicted expectations & actual use of drugs 9 months later; for users, both variables directly affected expectations & indirectly affected actual use. Drug use prevalence did not predict either outcome, though specific estimates of peer alcohol use did affect later drinking. Since estimates of several other drug-specific relations were required to fit the model, both general & drug-specific effects are hypothesized to explain adolescent drug use. 8 Tables, 3 Figures, 65 References Adapted from the source document.

¶ An evaluation of the notion that Canadian drug policy has become much less "war-like" than US drug policy. After documenting the similarity in past history & approaches to the prohibition of narcotics in both countries, & the considerably lower rates of illicit drug use in Canada, recent trends in legal & policy responses are compared utilizing survey data, official records, proposed & actual legal changes, & political pronouncements. It is argued that a modest retreat from prohibitionism occurred in Canada 1969-1986, marked by sharp decreases in drug use after the initial epidemic, reductions in cannabis arrests & convictions, less severe sentencing, various proposals for reform, increased protection of the rights of drug offenders, & greater social tolerance of drug use. Then, fueled by the latest US antidrug crusade & the cocaine scare, a reversal occurred from 1987 onward. The resurgence of prohibitionism was characterized by an increase in drug charges, severe sentencing, new state powers of seizure & forfeiture of assets, banning of drug paraphernalia, the introduction of drug testing, & other proposals to limit the liberty of convicted drug traffickers. These shifts occurred despite an official national drug strategy that favored demand over supply reduction & supported more education & treatment. It is concluded that the strong tradition of criminalization & infusion of resources into drug enforcement hampered & ultimately neutralized efforts to shape Canada's drug strategy in a new, less punitive direction; however, health-based public policy based on the concepts of harm reduction remains an elusive future goal. 4 Figures. ¶ The concept of relationship addiction is critiqued from feminist & psychodynamic perspectives. Adult Children of Alcoholics (ACOA) is presented as a case example of the programmatic appication of the disease model of addiction to interpersonal problems, & a review of the recovery literature commonly used in ACOA groups is combined with participant observation of group meetings in the Portland, Ore, area. ACOA's focus on the pathology that underlies excessive responsibility for others is discussed within the context of changing gender roles. Historical & ideological factors contributing to the appeal of recovery groups such as ACOA are discussed. It is concluded that the concept of relationship addiction is overincorporative & that its use within ACOA groups promotes regressive modes of reasoning. The implications of the critique presented for feminist & psychotherapeutic practices are also discussed. 31 References. AA

The emphasis is on the value of local research, & of comparative studies between localities (eg, cities). National surveys offer a useful baseline against which to set local studies, & are also used to inform broad policies; it is argued, however, that they are often misused & that their contribution at the national policy level is overrated. Since most service delivery & prevention activities occur at the local level, the strengths & weaknesses of different research methods & data sources are discussed. 1 Table, 22 References. Heath, Dwight B. (Brown U, Providence RI 02912), US Drug Control Policy: A Cultural Perspective, UM Daedalus, 1992, 121, 3, summer, 269-291.

¶ The US "war on drugs" is characterized as an expensive but fruitless political stance, creating more problems than it resolves both at home & abroad. Brief historical & cross-cultural analyses demonstrate both inconsistency & variability in attitudes toward alcohol & drugs, & the repeated failure of attempts at prohibition. Disproportionate punishment of ethnic minorities, together with heavy criticism of tactics, strategy, & statements of responsible officials by others who seek no advantage, reinforce popular dissatisfaction with repressive approaches. A feasible alternative is proposed, comprising selective legalization with restrictions, plus community-based health promotion as preventive, combined with adequate treatment. The objection that liberalization would be counterproductive license is countered by analogous experience, & variation among the states could provide quasi-experimental data for evaluating alternative approaches. ¶ Covariation of drinking beliefs & behaviors points to the importance of cultural & social variables in alcohol use. Ethnicity is one variable often examined in studies on alcohol usage, but it has been imprecisely applied. Using a deconstructionist perspective, five dominant models of ethnicity are analyzed: as bureaucratic category, race, national heritage, religion, & special population. Each usage is found to be imprecise, & many are garbled. Thus, comparisons commonly made between the usages are of questionable value. Valuable insights have been made in understanding sociocultural systems & alcohol through studies using ethnicity as a variable, but since neither ethnic categories nor alcohol use are static, new models should be applied. 41 References. ¶ The misuse of prescribed medicines is now being recognized by German physicians as an important form of drug abuse. Key problems include taking larger & more frequent doses than prescribed, & mixing prescripton drugs with alcohol or illegal narcotics. Drawing a sharp line between misuse & dependency problems is difficult; painkillers, tranquilizers, & sedatives create the most problems of this type. An international comparison shows that the former West Germany had a high index of daily doses of painkillers, twice that for Denmark, three times for Norway & Sweden, & six times for Iceland & Finland. Additional problems derive from use of prescription drugs under restrictive work conditions & physical exertion, in close quarters, & while engaged in emotionally intensive activities. Suggestions for controlling this situation include prescribing smaller quantities of drugs, substituting nonprescription drugs when possible, & regulating painkillers more strictly. 2 Graphs, 50 References. ¶ Following a literature review, alcohol use & misuse in ethnic communities in Canada is assessed via interview data from 56 Chinese, 93 Indo-Pakistani, & 56 Latin American youth & their parents from British Columbia. Per chi-square analyses, the 3 communities differed widely on their perceptions of the social acceptance of alcohol use by women, but agreed in these perceptions about men. Estimates of actual female alcohol consumption also differed among the communities: Latin American women were perceived to drink more frequently & heavier than the other 2 groups. Latin American youth were perceived to drink the most & Chinese youth the least. In general, alcohol-related problems were considered least serious & widespread in the Chinese community, & considerably more serious in the Latin American & Indo-Pakistani communities. Family difficulties & wife/child abuse presented themselves in all 3 communities as both possible causes & major consequences of alcohol abuse. Findings are discussed in terms of their specific implications for prevention programs. 6 Tables, 3 Figures, 61 References. Adapted from the source document.

Outpatient cessation from cocaine abuse, deactivation of cocaine addiction, a behavioral model of cocaine cessation based on differentiating "triggers," or dangerous situations, & long-term lifestyle changes are discussed. It is argued that recovery from cocaine addiction demands greater attention to sociological factors than do relapse prevention models applied to other addictions, because of its association with a deviant lifestyle. Clinical techniques developed in adapting RTSH to a cocaine recovery system are described, focusing on the role of the recovery group. ¶ Left Realist approaches to understanding heroin use & to formulating policies to deal with such use as a social problem are critically evaluated. The epistemological foundation of Left Realism is challenged, especially its prioritizing of inner city residents' experiences. The account of heroin use offered by Nicholas Dorn & Nigel South (eg, see A Land Fit for Heroin, London: MacMillan, 1987) & their formulation of an appropriate policy are argued to have fundamental weaknesses as a result of their Left Realist assumptions. Some alternative paradigms for interpreting drug use are proposed, with focus on theorizing demand, & alternative policy directions emerging from this emphasis are discussed. ¶ The failure of current law enforcement approaches to drug control is reviewed, & a model presented that includes decriminalization & legalization of drugs. Under current US policy, the legal status of a drug stems from enculturation & is not related to its potential to cause harm. This leads to inconsistencies & sets up an artificial dichotomy between legal & illegal drugs, with legal drugs perceived as acceptable & safe, & illegal drugs not so perceived. Such a policy is maladaptive, incongruous, & ineffective. A rational drug policy must acknowledge the inevitable availability of psychoactive drugs & proceed by decriminalizing small amounts of all psychoactive drugs for personal use. Laws distinguishing between responsible & irresponsible use of drugs should be promoted, & national drug education & treatment programs should be established. 40 References. ¶ The current trend toward treating drug & alcohol (& other) addictions in disease-oriented, twelve-step programs has had less success than most people believe. Treatments that teach coping skills, mobilize community forces, & instill values toward prosocial behavior have had success rates far superior to therapies that instruct individuals that they take drugs or drink excessively because they have a disease or because drugs are inherently addictive. Successful treatments instead deal with addicts' interactions with their environments & help them develop beliefs in their self-efficacy. Nonetheless, even addiction treatments that have demonstrated success face limitations in their ability to confront individual intentions & values, community standards, & environmental pressures & opportunities. At the same time, more individuals have quit addictions on their own than have been successfully treated by even the best therapies. No therapy will ever be able in itself to make a substantial impact on problems of addiction. In the meantime, addiction treatment is becoming more pervasive & coercive, & could corrupt our society & the self-conceptions of its members. 1 Table, 12 References. ¶ An examination of four perspectives in evaluation research on the treatment of alcohol problems: controlled group studies, consequences of basic models of behavior influences, clinical impressions, & macrolevel treatment effects. It is argued that research approaches should be selected based on the level of knowledge: when knowledge is scant, field qualitative research is appropriate; with basic clinical knowledge; experimental single case studies are useful; & advanced knowledge provides the basis for experimental group studies. Evaluation of social programs is appropriate only after a solid body of research knowledge has been accumulated. 3 Tables, 1 Diagram, 50 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ The failure of the US health care system to develop effective national policy for the treatment of drug abuse is examined, & a new approach outlined. The current system of treatment has failed in terms of the ability of drug users to obtain effective treatment in a timely fashion, particularly if they are minorities. The evolution of the current treatment system is discussed, & it is shown how several loopholes in the system have compromised past efforts by policymakers to improve treatment effectiveness. It is argued that neither the medical nor criminal justice approach adequately deals with the contemporary problem of drug use. A new approach, termed the "public utility model," is outlined, under which a single, federally-funded health-provider agency would be established in communities & would be monitored by local government. The proposed model would reduce existing geographic disparities in willingness to fund drug treatment & would permit more accurate assessments of treatment capacities. 2 Figures. W. Howard

¶ A hypothetical case of problem drinking was presented in a survey of 110 southwestern US students from sixth grade to college to explore the development of popular theories of & attitudes surrounding adolescent alcohol abuse. With age, students perceived the problem as less serious; less often attributed it to moral weakness, but displayed little change in their endorsement of causal views emphasizing biological disease, bad environment, or normal motives; more often emphasized the individual's own responsibility for solving the problem & the value of self-initiated & nonpunitive treatment; & expressed more acceptance of the problem drinker. In addition, males were more likely to normalize & tolerate problem drinking. Deviance from adult-sanctioned, conventional values, although a contributor to tolerant views in its own right, could account for only some age & gender differences in perceptions. Implications for substance abuse education are discussed. 2 Tables, 2 Appendixes, 28 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Statistical data indicate that prevalence levels of HIV (human immunodeficiency virus) infection among injecting drug users (IDUs) rapidly reached 50+% or more in several major cities worldwide; other cities have seen sustained lower levels of infection, & in some cases declining incidence. Previous research indicates that many long-term IDUs now have high levels of HIV transmission awareness, & are able to change their behavior to reduce risk of infection. Public health interventions & drug treatment enable behavioral change, though current residual levels of risk probably remain high enough to ensure continued spread of infection Improved prevention efforts must focus on initiating & sustaining change, education regarding risky sexual behavior, & methods for reaching harder-to-reach populations (women, younger IDUs, nonurbanites, & prisoners). 5 Figures, 97 References. ¶ Substance abuse, mental health problems, & the pychological well-being of homeless postadolescents are examined through interview data from 100 residents ages 18-21 of a short-term shelter in southern Fla & application of DSM-III diagnostic criteria. The sample was characterized by high levels of social dysfunction--low educational achievement, few job skills, poor work histories, & limited interpersonal coping networks--& higher prevalence rates than the same age general population for alcohol & drug abuse, depression, & schizophrenia. Only 31% of the sample had no DSM-III diagnosis, & comorbidity of diagnosed disorders was pervasive. Multiple disorders were diagnosed for all but one of the sample who met the DSM-III criteria for any diagnosis. 5 Tables, 1 Appendix, 23 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A wide-ranging discussion of the various backgrounds & roles of drug user treatment counselors, based on a review of the literature. Ex-user counselors & so-called "professional" (ie, those with graduate training) counselors are compared, & the functioning of counselors in different settings is examined, including a variety of therapeutic communities, methadone programs, & outpatient drug-free programs. Issues concerning training are addressed, including the lack of adequate training in some areas, & the lack of consistent, nationwide standards for credentialing drug counselors. It is suggested that alcoholism counselors might serve as models for drug user counselors. Implications for the future--eg, personnel development procedures, the perceived decline of the experientially based counselor & increase in professional counselors, the dramatic increase in numbers & types of clients & drug usage, the impact of AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome), funding & salaries, & evolving treatment formats--are discussed. 1 Table, 44 References. ¶ A study of 25 women in substance abuse treatment programs in Pa, NJ, & NY demonstrates why research failing to address gendered patterns in substance abuse & treatment approaches is inherently limited. Life history & ethnographic methods are used in combination with interview data to allow the participants to tell their own stories while the researcher observes actions & asks for clarifications. The life line exercises suggest several common experiences among women substance abusers--despite variations in social, cultural, & economic conditions--including psychic pain, violence, abuse, & male dominance. Findings point to the need for gender-specific treatment groups, currently a rarity, because these patterns cannot be effectively addressed in a cross-sex context. A five-step approach to gender-specific treatment is proposed. 34 References. M. Maguire

¶ The Townsend movement enjoyed varied success in seeking pensions for the aged during the depression. Social movement (SM) models predict that success depends on the mobilization of resources or on collective action, while other theories predict that economic or political conditions cause both the emergence of SMs & changes in public spending. Here, a political mediation model is proposed which posits that, to succeed, a SM must reinforce political action with strong organization of members under favorable political conditions. After defining what constitutes SM success, various analytical & empirical strategies, including qualitative comparative analysis on state-level data, regarding old-age spending, 1930-1950, are used to appraise all the models. Although each perspective has some support, the political mediation model offers the best explanation of the patterns of successes. The state & the political party system determine whether mobilization & action benefit a constituency & win acceptance for a SM organization. 4 Tables, 2 Figures, 3 Charts, 73 References. ¶ Travis Hirschi's & M. R. Gottfredson's claim for the invariance of age distribution of crime under different social & cultural conditions (see SA 32:2/84N8645) is reconciled with other claims for variance. Mathematical form invariance (consistent with Hirschi & Gottfredson) is distinguished from parametric invariance, & both types are tested using age-specific arrest data from the US Census & Federal Bureau of Investigation for 7 index offenses, 1952-1987. The gamma density function is a slightly better fit for the age distribution of violent crime, but gamma & lognormal functions fit property offenses equally well. These results are largely consistent with variability in the parameters of the age distribution of crime, but at the same time, provide evidence for a persistent, underlying mathematical form to the distribution, regardless of year or offense type. 3 Tables, 30 References. Cohen, Lawrence (Dept Anthropology Harvard U, Cambridge MA 02138), No Aging in India: The Uses of Gerontology, Culture, Medicine and Psychiatry, 1992, 16, 2, June, 123-161.

¶ A critique of international gerontology is constructed via an ethnographic & textual analysis of gerontological practice in India. It is argued that the central theme of Indian gerontology–that of an imminent demographic & social explosion of an aging population who will tax the country's slender resources–misrepresents available statistical data & fails to signify the experience of most old people. Narrative & deconstructive techniques are deployed to examine the langauge of crisis & the complex sources of this misrepresentation, focusing on: local disjunctions of class & gender; neocolonial biases in the structure of knowledge on aging central to international discourse; & subaltern strategies within India for subverting Western & elite Indian imperatives of what it means to be old. Case studies are offered of four contemporary institutions designed to meet the needs of old people: a social service agency, a geriatric clinic, a retirement community, & an old age home. 54 References. ¶ A historical examination of perspectives on the beginning of old age reviews literature from biblical, medieval, Renaissance, colonial, & modern eras. Findings reveal that historically, women were viewed as aging faster & sooner than men, & that old age was perceived in relation to function in society. The influence of mortality rates & life expectancy on perceptions of old age is found negligible. Some historical consistencies are indicated, eg, the location of beginning of old age around age 60, & a distinction between young-old & old-old. It is suggested that in the future, the beginning of old age in the US may be acknowledged to occur later in the lifespan, due to the growth in the aged population. I. ¶ One of the most significant trends in twentieth century US is the constant expansion of the senior citizen population (age 65 & over)–in both absolute & relative terms. While a huge social scientific literature has emerged on this older population, the vast political implications of this aging trend have remained unexplored. In 1988, senior citizen George Bush replaced senior citizen Ronald Reagan as President, 66% of the Supreme Court justices were age 65+, & many of the most powerful members of Congress were senior citizens. Considered here are the nation's 8 senior citizen vice presidents, focusing primarily on explanations for their nomination. Although the nation has had such vice presidents during each third of its history (the first inaugurated in 1805, the most recent one 1974), they have served with relatively greater frequency since the 1920s. Probable factors underlying this trend include continually increasing life expectancy, the growth in the senior citizen segment of the nation's population & its political mobilization, & some decline in ageism. 1 Table. ¶ A random sample of 720 retired government employees living in Chandigarh & Jabalpur (India) & 46 residents of old age homes in Delhi were interviewed in an effort to: (1) explain the emergence of the social problem of old age; (2) establish correlates & simultaneously evaluate theories of successful aging; & (3) suggest proper policy for tackling the problem of the aged in Indian society. A statistically significant positive association was found between the adjustment of the aged on one hand, & on the other, their socioeconomic status & health status (situational factors), positive attitudes toward social changes & noninterfering attitudes in the younger generation's personal affairs (attitudinal factors), & overall social interaction & activeness (behavioral factors). The findings demonstrate that the elderly who have a higher socioeconomic & health status, liberal attitudes, & substitute activities are more likely to lead a happy life. It is concluded that, due to structural & cultural changes, old age is emerging as a social problem in Indian society. Many aged are unable to solve their problems at the personal & familial levels, & hence look toward social assistance. The best policy for tackling the problem may be vesting the responsibility of care of the aged with the family, & providing domicilliary supportive services. Results indicate that, while current interactions with grandparents were infrequent, grandchildren perceived their grandparents, & grandmothers in particular, as influential in their value development. Grandchildren reported stronger relationships with grandmothers than with grandfathers. Differences in participation, value development, & relationships were also found according to the role in which grandchildren conceptualized grandparents. Factors that may have influenced grandchildren's perceptions & interactions with grandparents are explored. 4 Tables, 23 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ The existence & origin of the future in the present--a nonlinear perspective on time--is investigated in a sample of 103 adults ages 19-83, drawing on data obtained during semistructured interviews. Ss projected themselves into the oldest age imaginable, described their hopes & fears for that age, & named role models for those hopes & fears. Analysis revealed that length of future perspective, number of hopes, & number of role models for the distant future declined with age. Types of fears for the future varied with age, with older Ss stressing dependency issues & younger ones reporting concerns about personality & mental health. Despite age differences, most Ss could name role models for both their hopes & fears for aging, but specific models were identified more often for hopes than for fears. Personalized hopes & fears for the distant future as motivators for the present are discussed. 4 Tables, 1 Appendix, 39 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ To evaluate theoretical models designed to improve service for abused & neglected elders, 4 demonstration projects in different areas in Ill were comparatively studied 1985-1987. The project followed three models: (1) mandatory reporting that requires professionals to report suspected abuse; (2) legal intervention that emphasized legal services for the abused, eg, restraining orders; & (3) advocacy of lower intervention & broad provision of formal & informal coping assistance for the abused. Little relationship was found between the theoretical model of service delivery & the nature of service delivered. Other possible determinants of the nature of service are briefly discussed. 3 Tables, 30 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Results of a training program that teaches nursing skills designed to increase an elderly patient's sense of control demonstrate the promise of participatory control concepts. Observational & evaluation data for 20 nurse-patient dyads in an extended care facility reveal that the trained nurses experienced greater effectiveness & their patients gained a sense of involvement in their care; ie, as participatory control ideals would predict, patients were able to increase their effectiveness in exercising control when their nurses interacted with them in ways that facilitate personal control. These findings cast new light on previous studies of control & the institutionalized elderly. 4 Tables, 25 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Changes in the size & composition of the older population of the world & implications for social policy are examined. Demographic changes in the older population, eg, an increasing ratio of older to younger adults & an increasing proportion of able, educated, & financially secure adults entering old age, are challenging expectations that old age means retirement from work & loss of incentives to make productive contributions to society. The growing mismatch between older people's abilities & roles challenges existing social policy. The possibilities of altering the age structure & restructuring the meaning of old age are considered, along with the role of the state, family, & the individual in supporting the elderly. 2 Tables, 103 References. ¶ In an examination of guardianship hearings for the aged as sociolegal encounters, interactions during the hearing & implications for legal representation of the elderly client are probed, drawing on data obtained during participant observation & in-depth interviews with 5 attorneys & the administrative assistant in the probate court of a medium-sized city in Kan. It is concluded that guardianship proceedings for the aged should be pursued only as a last resort. Additional recommendations include: the use of a more extensive pre-evaluation form, attorney training in the cognitive & physical changes of aging, alternatives to full guardianship, & fundamental structural changes in the conduct of the hearings. 2 Figures, 1 Appendix, 19 References. ¶ An ecological model based on U. Bronfenbrenner's The Ecology of Human Development: Experiments by Nature and Design (Cambridge: Harvard U Press, 1979) of social support (SS) is used to explain differences in elderly females' (Fs') psychological adjustment to community & institutional life. The results of a 12-month study yielding questionnaire & observational data for 20 elderly Fs in the community & 20 in a nursing home are presented as empirical support for the ecological model, contending that institutionalization is both a reaction to, & a cause of, the rupture of Fs' SS systems. It would not be difficult to make institutions more responsive to the psychological & SS needs of elderly residents. Several practical suggestions are offered for creating ecologically sound nursing homes. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 40 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ In 1911 a new public morality act–Article 250bis–was enacted in the Netherlands that made it forbidden to provide opportunities for prostitution. This so-called article on brothel keeping was the result of growing pressure by a coalition of Christian puritans, socialists, & feminists at the end of the nineteenth century. In the 1980s, a coalition of feminist & bureaucratic powers proposed that this general prohibition on brothel keeping be rescinded. Here, this change in the public debate on prostitution, & especially the influence of feminism, is analyzed from a moral point of view, arguing that the Dutch prostitution issue is seen as a case of postmodern morality, ie, resulting from bureaucratic needs for regulation & subjective experiences of the persons involved. 29 References. ¶ An overview of research conducted within an anti-ageism paradigm demonstrates that young people process & respond to the speech of older people in stereotypical ways. Experimental studies demonstrate that older-sounding speech triggers age schematic responses & that young people tend to use ageist strategies of information seeking & compliance gaining from older people. Interactive studies explore how stereotypes & age identities are coproduced by young & old people in conversation. Drawing on lifespan & intercultural perspectives, it is argued that the communicative patterns observed are in some senses & contexts counterproductive in both the long & short term, in that they can reproduce negative attitudes toward aging as well as inhibit successful aging. 64 References. ¶ The relationship between alcohol & homicide in Denmark is examined via review of the psychiatric reports of 251 homicide defendants, filed in Copenhagen 1959-1983. Nearly 55% of the defendants were habitual abusers of alcohol or other drugs & were intoxicated at the time of the alleged homicide. Women demonstrated a lower homicide rate than men & were rarely involved in the homicide of a nonrelative; 57% of males were involved in homicides outside of the family. Defendants involved in the homocide of a relative tended to be older & less often intoxicated than those involved in homicides outside the family. Extrafamilial homicide was found to increase over the study period. 4 Tables, 1 Appendix, 27 References. Modified AA

¶ Police & municipal statistics for all 71 neighborhoods in Utrecht, Netherlands, in 1984 & 1987 are drawn on to examine the relationships among neighborhood structure, crime, & offender mobility. The highest crime rates were found in the inner-city neighborhoods. ¶ Structured interview data are drawn on to compare the degree of criminal involvement among random samples of ethnic minority boys ages 12-17 in the Netherlands–182 Moroccans, 196 Turks, & 206 Surinamese–with that of a control group of their Dutch peers (N = 206) from the same socioeconomic background. Analysis indicates that the arrest rates among minority youth are substantially higher than those of their indigenous Dutch peers. Several explanations for this are offered: strain, lack of social control, cultural dissonance, & migration problems. Data indicate, however, that only social control factors explain criminality within both groups, suggesting that the causes of crime may be similar for indigenous & migrant youth. 8 Tables, 1 Appendix, 48 References. ¶ The strengths & weaknesses of leftist realist discourse & practice both theoretically & methodologically are presented, arguing that the definitional crisis facing contemporary criminology can in part be resolved politically by Left realism & its commitment to the local crime survey. Jock Young's conception of the etiological crisis facing criminology, presented in Confronting Crime (see IRPS No. 37/87c00800) is challenged, arguing that the crisis is a definitional one. Ian Taylor's six-point criticism of the definitions of crime ("Left Realism, the Free Market Economy and the Problem of Social Order," paper delivered at the American Society of Criminology Annual Meetings, Chicago, Nov 1988) as used by Left realist surveys is also challenged, claiming that the critique is both misplaced & contradictory. Methodological considerations important to the progressive potential that local crime survey technology offers for criminology are explored. It is contended that if Left realism is to distinguish itself from a more conventional approach, local crime surveys must consider the measurement of all moments within the process of crime construction, eliminating the conservative & sexist bias inherent in conventional surveys, & coping with the sampling error produced by cost-effective sampling designs, local vs national surveys, the use of proxy interviews, & the use of in-person vs telephone interviews. 3 Figures. ¶ Using data on homicides from the 1980-1984 Federal Bureau of Investigation Uniform Crime Reports & Comparative Homicide File, the relationship between levels of racial inequality & homicide rates for a sample of 154 US cities is explored. Four causal processes that explain the link between racial inequality & criminal violence are identified through a literature review. These explanations imply distinctive relationships between racial inequality & different types of homicide rates disaggregated by the racial characteristics of victims & offenders. Results reveal significant, positive coefficients for racial inquality in equations predicting total homicide rates & race-specific offending rates, offering greatest support for theoretical arguments emphasizing a generalized effect of racial inequality on the offending behavior of residents of metropolitan communities. 4 Tables, 47 References. ¶ Peter M. Blau's macrostructural theory (Inequality and Heterogeneity: A Primitive Theory of Social Structure, New York: Free Press, 1977) is extended by incorporating elements of the general criminal opportunity perspective, & applied to statistical data on interracial homicide for 154 US cities with populations of 100,000+. Consistent with Blau's theory, multivariate analysis reveals that the relative frequency of interracial homicide is positively related to racial heterogeneity, population size, & population density, & inversely related to racial residential segregation & racial socioeconomic inequality. Level of employment is positively related to the rate of interracial homicide, consistent with the hypothesis, derived from routine activities theory, that the dispersion of activities away from primary group locations & toward more racially heterogeneous settings increases the volume of intergroup contacts. It is concluded that a macrostructural-opportunity perspective offers considerable insight into the determinants of intercity variation in the racial patterning of homicide. 2 Tables, 61 References. ¶ In response to a perceived "wave of computer crime," between 1975 & 1986 48 states passed laws specifically criminalizing unauthorized access to computer-based information between 1975 & 1986; such laws were passed in 30 states between 1982 & 1985. Analysis of questionnaires returned by 69 prosecutors in SMSAs of states having computer crime laws, however, indicates that these laws did not result in any corresponding wave of prosecutions of computer criminals. Findings suggest that social forces other than an instrumental need for a mechanism to prosecute computer criminals played a role in the passage of computer crime laws. Specifically, it is argued that the passage of computer crime laws resulted from the need to incorporate a new form of value within the established framework of property rights, & a desire to preserve established relationships between power & knowledge that were threatened by the emergence of computer technology. It is also suggested that the study of law-making is enhanced by examining the structural bases for the motives of legislators & advocates of legal change, in addition to the motives themselves. 1 Table. ¶ Cross-national research studies that do not support the Durkheimian-modernization hypothesis (ie, economic modernization increases the rate of crime) are flawed because they have: (1) assessed the criminogenic consequences of different levels of economic development rather than changes in development; & (2) failed to control for the confounding effects of changes in the age structure of populations. Here, pooled cross-sectional & time-series INTERPOL data 1969-1982 for 51 countries support the Durkheimian-modernization hypothesis for both homicide & theft rates. It is concluded that community attributes are intervening, not causal, variables, while the cause of spiraling crime rates is primarily economic. A strong relationship is found between deindustrialization & high crime rates, meaning that typical anticrime measures will likely fail to reduce crime rates if they are not accompanied by a plan for industrial reorganization. 24 Figures. ¶ The impact of the Scotland's 1985 Family Law on solicitors' practice in divorce cases is investigated, drawing on a previous study of all divorces in Scotland during a 1-year period (N = 10,547) & interviews with 58 solicitors. The Act is a major instrument of family law reform designed to regulate financial & other consequences of divorce in Scotland, as well as an instrument of social policy with the potential to effect large-scale transfers of resources between individuals & households. The "simulated client" technique was developed to gather information about how solicitors negotiate the financial aspects of divorce with clients. It is suggested that the approach offers certain benefits in studying elite groups where access & client confidentiality pose specific problems for participant observation, & where the need to study the treatment of specific issues or how professional response & behavior vary across the profession requires a more controlled approach to content. 2 Figures, 12 References. ¶ Data obtained via semistructured interviews, observation, & self-report survey from students & teachers (N not provided) at 52 junior high schools in several Dutch cities are drawn on to explore the impact of school characteristics on the rate of petty crime committed by third-year, low-stream students ages 15-17. Results are used to test a conditional version of social control theory, which recognizes the possible delinquent influences of student networks. Analysis reveals a strong relationship between student integration into school & petty crime; no school characteristics affected this relationship, though the influence of students' networks was strong. Findings are compared to those of previous studies, & implications for educational policy discussed. 7 Tables, 2 Figures, 27 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An empirical test of the version of Edwin H. Sutherland's differential association theory (eg, see "Development of a Theory," in Cohen, A. K., Lindesmith, A. L., & Schuessler, K. (Eds), The Sutherland Papers, Bloomington: Indiana U Press, 1956, 13-59) expanded by German methodologist Karl-Dieter Opp (Abweichendes Verhalten und Gesellschaftsstruktur [Deviant Behavior and Social Structure], Neuwied: Luchterhand, 1974); some new theoretical specifications that are in accordance with Sutherland's original thesis are also examined. Likert-type scale data obtained from a cluster sample of 1,196 adolescents ages 12-17 at 5 Dutch secondary schools demonstrate the significant impact of the frequency of contact with deviant friends on the development of positive definitions of deviant behavior & on the frequency of communication about effective criminal techniques. The more youth identify themselves with deviant peers, the greater is the impact of their deviancy on personal norms. In general, results confirm Opp's revised thesis, which explains 51% of the variance in deviance; they also falsify some propositions of social control theory. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 1 Appendix, 55 References. ¶ The observation that many delinquent children have suffered learning disability problems has resulted in the controversial conjecture that learning disabilities may lead to juvenile delinquency. Establishing the relationship has been difficult, possibly due to the ambiguity associated with the definitions, causes, & characteristics relating to juvenile delinquency & learning disabilities. A review of research facts & findings relative to the link between the two problems is offered, & a model for additional research to prove this relationship proposed. 47 References. ¶ It is argued that recent surveys of drug use among youths in the general US population indicating that drug use has declined are biased for failing to consider dropouts & institutionalized youth, including drug use among juvenile detainees. Here, a review of the literature & an ongoing longitudinal study of 399 juvenile detainees in Tampa, Fla, are drawn on to document their drug use & related problems, leading to the identification of five key areas for national policy & program development: early intervention; quality screening & assessment; providing quality, community-based services; improving linkages between community agencies; & continuity of services. Youths entering the juvenile justice system often require repeated interventions over a protracted period, reinforced by improvements in their social, vocational, & educational skills, if their lives are to be directed in socially responsible ways. Abstracted from the source document.

¶ Juvenile justice processing data from 32 Fla counties 1979-1981 are used to examine 2 competing models: that minority races receive harsher treatment in accordance with conflict theory, because they lack resources & power, or because they threaten the dominant group's hegemony. The effects of 3 measures of black power–the relative size of black & white populations, the proportion of blacks who are poor, & the average black/white income gap–on differential treatment of black & white juveniles at 3 court processing stages are considered. Findings show that a higher proportion of whites in the population is associated with harsher dispositions for black youths, a result consistent with traditional conflict theory. The other two measures have no differential racial effect on disposition severity. 3 Tables, 41 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Data obtained in 1982 via structured interviews & official police records for a random sample of 2,000 youth ages 12-18 in Venlo & The Hague, Netherlands, & a subsample of 331 youth reinterviewed 2 years later, are used to test Travis Hirschi's social control theory (Causes of Delinquency, Los Angeles: U of California Press, 1969). HOMALS principal component analysis was used to operationalize the theory, constructing scales of family & school integration, peer relations, involvement in activities, & beliefs in conventional norms. Path & LISREL analyses indicate that there was no impact on delinquency of official intervention by police or prosecutors over the 2-year period, but there was a strong & inverse relationship between changes in social integration & frequency of offending, supporting the tenets of social control theory. 6 Tables, 4 Figures, 1 Appendix, 19 References. ¶ In third-generation research on street gangs, it has been hypothesized that an increase in postadolescent street gang membership is linked to deteriorating inner-city economic conditions. To test this hypothesis, age & socioeconomic status (SES) of street gang members were investigated via field interviews with 435 nonrandomly selected, active street gang members in southern Calif. Regression analysis revealed no overrepresentation of adult gang members in black & white lower-SES groups, & these groups did not differ in age from the white middle-/upper-SES sample, disconfirming the hypothesis. Gang membership peaked at age 16-17, showing only a slight trend toward increasing age levels. 3 Tables, 1 Appendix, 35 References. M. Pflum

¶ The social-psychological theories of internal social control & of differential association are used to test 2 hypotheses on delinquent female adolescents–ie, that girls with higher deviant behavior will show (1) lower internal control & (2) higher association with delinquent peers–via questionnaire data collected from 90 girls ages 9-15 who participated in the Girls' Adventure Trails in Dallas, Tex, 1984-1986. Measures of internal social control were: attachment to parents, commitment to education, involvement in homework, attitudes on drug abuse, & respect for law. Findings were consistent with both hypotheses. The applicability of sociological theoretical models to clinical research is discussed. 1 Figure, 31 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Japan has one of the lowest delinquency rates in the Western world, despite urbanization, crowding, industrialization, & a high-technology work ethic. However, in this family-centered & traditional culture, rapid social change over the last two decades has created the potential for increasing secularization of various institutional spheres–economic, political, religious, & scientific. This could cause a decline in community-based measures of social control that have restrained the growth of delinquency, while demonstrating that the industrialization experience does not necessarily support the norms that would sustain consensus & a homogeneous culture. 16 References. The project had an impact on health care status, particularly among infants & children, but results indicated that more effort was needed to reach mothers. It was noted that building space & the appearance of the workplace influenced the prestige of the team. Absentee problems could be partly solved by home visits, concluding that health services in underdeveloped areas need to be supported by nonmedical personnel to act as home visitors & as mediators between the community & the health team. Also, an established recording system to include both clinical data & attendance is needed to define the cases needing special care. 2 Tables, 12 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Based on qualitative interviews (N not specified), the views of single mothers regarding their receipt of means-tested economic assistance in Norway in 1971 & 1989 are compared. The 1971 respondents (Rs) did not express a desire for paid work, & the stigma of being on welfare was mitigated by their feeling that they were fulfilling the dominant norm--ie, staying home to take care of their children. In 1989, Rs legitimated their status by referring to their duty of both providing & caring for their children & their earlier role as taxpayers, & most expressed a desire to work. This change in perspective reflects the views of Norwegian mothers in general, irrespective of marital status or whether they are receiving welfare. It is argued that a gender-neutral perspective in such research obscures problematic aspects of women's everyday life & their relation to the welfare state. 15 References. Information obtained included socioeconomic indicators, relationship with baby's father, timing of prenatal care, psychosocial factors, & substance use before pregnancy. Ethnic patterns of timing of prenatal care reveal no significant differences. The relationship with the baby's father was associated with early timing of & more frequent prenatal care. Substance use before pregnancy was significantly related to total number of visits for this pregnancy. 3 Tables, 25 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Institutional mechanisms for handling matters of spousal & child abuse in US military families stationed abroad are explored. While new programs have been set up during the 1980s, the laws in place to deal with abuse often result in frustration & miscarried justice because civilians have no legal standing in military courts of law. As such, cases of abuse involving nonmilitary personnel are generally referred to the host country's legal system, which has unfamiliar laws, cultural assumptions, & language. These problems are likely to intensify as military cutbacks lead to the elimination of social programs. It is suggested that alleviating these problems will require the establishment of a closer relationship between US & host-country professionals working with US victims of abuse. 6 References. M. ¶ The relationship between family structure disruption & violent victimization is examined through analysis of General Social Survey data 1973-1984 (total N = 4,447). Persons reared by both natural parents are less likely to become victims of violence than those reared in father-absent or, to a larger extent, stepfather families. A stronger relationship between family structure & victimization was found for whites than for blacks. Adverse effects of family structure occurred when family disruption was due to divorce or separation but not to death of the father. Results are discussed as being inconsistent with protest masculinity theory. 4 Tables, 68 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Patterns of economic exchange between battered wives & their husbands in Israel were examined through unstructured interviews with 35 residents of a shelter for battered women. Although norms concerning breadwinning & housekeeping are similar & generally accepted throughout Western society, in practice, battering husbands do not subscribe to them. The wives of battering husbands generally must provide the financial support for the family as well as perform the housekeeping chores. The same nonacceptance of marriage norms occurs even with battered wives whose husbands earn a good living. Husbands in such families appear to regard their earnings not as an obligation, but as a favor that entitles them to receive extra benefits from their wives, ie, absolute obedience & submissiveness. 21 References. [Eds], Psykologprofesjonen mot ar 2000 [Psychology Professions Approaching the Year 2000], Oslo: Universitetsforlaget, 1987). Analysis of the questionnaire data reveals that: about 21% of the children reported being bullied; 17% reported bullying others; reports of both bullying & being bullied were more prevalent among boys than girls, & among the younger vs older group; the most common forms of bullying were teasing & hitting/kicking; bullying tended to occur on the journey to & from school; & victims were likely to report feeling unhappy & lonely at school. Reasons why children participate in bullying are discussed, & it is concluded that bullying can have a causal role in the development of low self-esteem. 2 Tables, 21 References. ¶ Despite the universality & severity of violence directed against women, which has historically been recounted in art, literature, & personal accounts, the problem has not generally been a subject for social analysis. The challenge of the 1990s is to draw attention to the global nature of the crisis. To that end, international networking must gather strength, & promote the movement underway since 1985 to put the issue on the world's human rights agenda. ¶ Quantitative & qualitative data obtained in 1989 for a sample of 394 children residing with their mothers in 23 Danish crisis centers for abused women are used to explored the extent of the children's own neglect or physical abuse. Results indicate that only a minority (6%-10%) have been victims of active abuse themselves, though all can be said to have been victims of passive abuse through witnessing the abuse of their mothers, being blamed as the cause of parental arguments that escalate into abuse, or attempting to intervene in the abuse by trying to divert the assaulter. Sociodemographic characteristics of abused mothers & their spouses/cohabitors are discussed, along with long-term psychological impacts on the children. ¶ An exploration of the way the effects of sexual abuse live on after the bodily experience in the form of bodily symptoms that express symbolic meaning. In contrast to recent British & French psychoanalytic work that continues to erect a dualism between the mind & the body by positing the mental sphere alone with its capacity to transform primitive affects into meaningful thoughts, it is aruged that the body can symbolize experience in its own manner of expression. To examine the way body symptoms are a form of expressive language, philosopher & phenomenologist Maurice Merleau-Ponty is considered; he questions the idea that thought occurs in a cut-off interior Cartesian mental space, & shows how action & thought go together. A case study of a sexually abused boy in a psychiatric clinic is included. The approach places emphasis on the adolescent's interpersonal social context & the relationship to family members, particularly to the abuser, the boy's older brother. 21 References. Modified AA

¶ Some courts currently allow expert testimony on battered woman's syndrome at the trial of a battered woman defendant, while others do not. Two criteria that judges rely on to determine admissibility of testimony are examined in an attempt to provide an empirical foundation for these decisions. First, the area of study that the expert testifies about must be shown to be reliable & valid. Second, the subject matter of the testimony must be shown to be beyond the ken of the average juror. Questionnaire data from 45 researchers in the field of spousal violence & 141 pretrial jurors demonstrate that: (1) there is a strong consensus among researchers concerning the reactions of abuse victims, & (2) jurors have limited knowledge about battered women. Because the scientific findings are found reliable & the information is not otherwise available to jurors, admissibility of expert testimony in cases involving battered women defendants is empirically sound. 4 Tables, 29 References. ¶ An examination of intake forms collected 1983-1985 (N = 240) at a shelter for battered women on the Navajo reservation in Shiprock, NM, as well as discussions (N not provided) with faculty at the Navajo Community Coll & U of New Mexico, highlight a discussion of the relationship between Navajo traditional cultural values & history & women battering. It is argued that public policy regarding the problem of women battering must take into consideration the history & cultural traditions of the victims, batterers, & those in a position to help them. With this understanding, it may be possible to develop more effective means of resolving the problem among discrete groups of people. 10 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Court-mandated counseling for batterers has rapidly expanded as a response to wife abuse during the last five years. However, court-mandated counseling has been criticized for uneven implementation, high dropout rates, & uncertain outcomes. A purposive sample of 30 batterer programs was selected nationally to examine criticisms. The sample was comprised of a subsample of 15 programs randomly selected from a national referral directory & a subsample of 15 programs identified as model programs. Staff interviews identified the number of participants during the previous year; type of court referral; program format, modality, & duration; completion rates; & primary concerns. Substantial variations in referral type, modality, & duration were found. Model programs were more likely to be larger & longer. A wide range of dropout rates were reported with the longer model programs reporting higher dropout rates. The greatest concern was the lack of court response to noncompliant & resistant referrals. Findings support the movement for greater collaboration with victim services & the legal system, & the effort to establish standards for court-mandated counseling. 2 Tables, 10 References. The principles of the UN 1985 declaration regarding victims of crime are applied specifically to women. The victimization of women is related to patriarchal power & the consequential disconfirmation from institutions & services. In the process, the tendency of the victimology field to relegate inequality & subjection to a gender variable is challenged. Legal, treatment, & social service issues are accessed, eg, the clash between victim & perpetrator services. Efforts for social change initiated largely by the women's movement need to be supported. ¶ The left realist assertion that the working class (Wc) suffers more than the middle- & upper classes from criminal victimization is tested using data from the Canadian Urban Victimization Survey (CUVS), which entailed interviews with a representative sample of 61,000+ household residents in 7 major cities. It is concluded that the CUVS produces biased data, since disenfranchised groups' experiences are not adequately examined. Ways that left realist surveys can provide a useful, defensible, alternative to the CUVS are outlined. 3 Tables, 1 Figure, 75 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ The effects of a rape victim's & an assailant's alcohol consumption on judgments of their traits, behaviors, & reactions afterward were investigated in a 2 X 2 X 2 between-Ss factorial experiment, using questionnaire data for 68 women & 64 men age 21+ recruited via a campus student newspaper. Ss read 1 of 4 stories in which only the victim, only the assailant, both victim & assailant, or neither victim nor assailant consumed alcohol. An individual difference trait, rape attitude, was also measured. Findings indicate that an acquaintance rape was not judged as severely when both members of a dating couple were consuming alcohol as when only the woman had been drinking. In particular, the belief that a rape occurred & perception of the victim's negative reactions decreased & the view of the assailant's likability & sexualness increased, when both had been drinking compared to only the victim drinking. The implication is that a woman & a man drinking together may signify an expectation that sexual activity will occur. In contrast, if only the woman has been drinking, the man may be viewed as taking advantage of her vulnerable or weakened condition. Implications for the treatment of acquaintance rape victims & for establishing assailant accountability are discussed. 1 Table, 1 Figure, 12 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ After reviewing 4 previously published studies on multiple sexual assault, a large community-based survey (N = 433) about sexual assault conducted in Los Angeles, Calif, 1983/84 is described, which investigated patterns of repeated sexual victimization via personal & telephone interviews. Contrary to both attribution theory & common sense ideology, multiple victimization is common: 66% of the respondents reported more than 1 incident; the average was 3.2. However, personal characteristics of the victim are unrelated to risk for subsequent assault because single- & multiple-incident victims are similar on a wide range of variables, eg, demographics, mental disorders, & general social functioning. A call is made for more research that explores contextual factors & relies on longitudinal research methods. 3 Tables, 35 References. Adapted from the source document. Sperling, Valerie (Georgetown U, Washington DC 20057), Rape and Domestic Violence in the USSR, Response to the Victimization of Women and Children, 1990, 13, 3, fall, 16-22.
¶ The utility of statistics in assessing the problem of rape & domestic violence in the USSR is considered, as are the legal system's contemporary response & Soviet theories of rape & violence. Statistics on rape are difficult to analyze because not all cases are reported by victims or acknowledged by officials. Soviet laws prohibiting rape are also hard to assess because of the variance between laws on the books & how the system works in practice. Finally, Soviet theories of rape are concerned primarily with sexual deviance rather than the issue of patriarchy & male dominance. Societal approaches to domestic violence are likewise limited at present. It is suggested that individuals must assume a more active role, & that feminist analyses (largely from the US) must reach a broader audience before the situation will change. 30 References. M. ¶ In interaction with health care providers, lesbian women have often endured unsympathetic treatment. Interviews conducted 1985/86 with 25 midwestern lesbians ages 21-58 about their health care experiences reveal the nature of institutional violence & abuse. More than 70% report negative responses from health care providers toward their sexual identity; 84% report a subsequent reluctance to seek medical care. Lesbians are thus victimized by both sexist & heterosexist attitudes when seeking medical care. Implications of these findings must be addressed before change can be expected. 45 References. M. Winkler, Cathy (Anthropology Dept Western Michigan U, Kalamazoo 49008), Rape as Social Murder, Anthropology Today, 1991, 7, 3, June, 12-14.
¶ The meaning of rape is analyzed from an investigator-victim perspective, based on a personal rape experience. Drawing on the rapist's actions & announcements during the rape, it is argued that the rapist tried to define himself into the victim's identity, through maneuvering the victim's body, & simultaneously interpreting the situation from his own perspective, & from the supposed perspective of the victim. To understand rape, the rapist's attempt to control the victim's body & mind should be analyzed, along with the temporary body-mind separation trauma experienced by the victim. It is concluded that a more poignant definition of rape is needed that accounts for the psychological, mental, & sexual control of the rapist that implies, during the attack, a social death for the victim. 10 References. ¶ It is argued that among the chief factors in promoting the bureaucratization of social work practice have been the recognition & definition of child abuse, & social reactions to it. The ways in which public inquiries & government agencies framed the problem of child abuse produced solutions that were legalistic & bureaucratic. To protect children from their families, rather than to rehabilitate dysfunctional families, administrative systems were developed to facilitate the collection & analysis of information gathered during investigations of families suspected of child abuse. These systems allowed welfare agencies to identify high-risk cases & develop judicial & bureaucratic procedures to handle them. The translation of child abuse into a set of bureaucratic procedures transformed social workers into passive agents & contributed to the bureaucratization of child care practice. 19 References. Data from the Cleveland (Ohio) Prosecutor Mediation Program (N = 724 cases mediated in 1987) are used to analyze gender & effectiveness at reaching initial & binding settlements. Findings indicate that M & F mediators are equally effective at reaching an initial settlement, but that F mediators are significantly more effective at mediating binding settlements. The greatest gender difference occurs in emotionally charged disputes. The hypothesis that mediator gender & style matter in the effectiveness of mediation is supported. 3 Tables, 21 References. ¶ In the 1960s, US sociological studies of psychiatry focused on involuntary hospitalization of the mentally ill. Using the labeling approach, psychiatry was defined as a system of social control. The practice of involuntary commitment of mental patients diminished in the 1970s, as psychiatrists increasingly recommended outpatient treatment. Sociological theories of mental illness were consequently modified to focus more on the inner processes of the mentally ill. Psychiatrists pointed out their medical & therapeutic mandate, seeing themselves as Good Samaritans, & promoted medical explanations for the dangerousness of psychologically ill persons. Involuntary commitment to outpatient treatment, which developed in the last ten years, has permitted psychiatrists to act as social control agents. 93 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Historical advances in psychiatry in the areas of etiology, therapeutics, & research strategy are chronicled, noting that biological psychiatry has dominated the 1980s. However, as psychiatrists flock to study new neurosciences like molecular biology, psychiatry's intrinsic purpose should not be forgotten: ie, discovering the link between bodily functions, subjective experience, & overt behavior in the disturbed functioning & biography of patients. Even under pressure from the biological sciences, research strategies in the current study of disease & therapeutics have not fundamentally shifted away from turn-of-the-century psychiatry toward modern molecular biology. Very basic biobehavioral operations are still not sufficiently described to precisely link brain & behavior. Thus, the intrinsic tension between impersonal biological processes & the perception of a socially conditioned & purposive self will persist. 1 Figure, 1 Appendix. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A study of the great figures in the Cuban philosophical tradition reveals a strong connection between philosophy & politics, to the point where politics constitutes the central problem of philosophy. This phenomenon grew with the diffusion & development of Marxist-Leninist thought; however, this growth was not without theoretical-ideological debate. By 1952, philosophy in Cuba had two fundamental streams: the academic philosophy of the universities, largely bourgeois & irrational, & the clandestine diffusion of progressive, Marxian, revolutionary ideas. Bourgeois philosophy, with its esotericism & isolation, gradually lost its previous richness & its relevance to economic reality. ¶ Raymond Williams's conception of culture (reference not specified) is examined to show that it is both illustrative & formative of cultural studies, & that it contains contradictions & unclear formulations. Several works by Williams are examined, & his definition of culture as the signifying system through which social order is communicated, reproduced, experienced, & explored is discussed. Williams's writing on money is examined to show how he conceived the problematic materiality of the signifier, & to demonstrate that his refusal to consider money as a cultural signifying system was a consequence of his use of Karl Marx's notions of base & superstructure. It is suggested that cultural critics eschew Williams's cultural materialism & instead focus on the tension between cultural imminence & signification. In On Catherine Gallagher's Critique of Raymond Williams, Stanley Aronowitz (City U of New York, NY) argues that Gallagher's critique of Raymond Williams's concept of culture is formalist, & shows how Williams's idea of culture effected a break with past conceptions of it. ¶ Many scholars would argue that historical science is beset by a profound crisis. The twentieth century, once called the century of the historians, is closing with a sense of despondency after experiencing two disastrous world wars & the rise & fall of cruel totalitarian regimes. Resulting cultural crises led to the downfall of the authority of scientific knowledge & destroyed belief in the inevitable march of progress. Some historians hold that advances in historical knowledge & theory-building occur as the response of crisis to previous historical epochs. In the USSR, the first & second thaws under Nikita Khrushchev represented brief renaissances of historical inquiry that were quickly extinguished. Currently a crisis exists in Marxist theory. A review of Marxism's links to Hegelianism & neo-Kantianism shows panlogicism, the belief in the all-powerfulness of logic, to be a prime tenet of these philosophical systems. Current historical dilemmas are a transformation of research methods & scientific approaches toward new logical & gnoseological principles & orientations. M. Meeks

¶ A literature review is presented on the German tradition of the sociology of knowledge (SofK) & its roots in the Central European cultural crisis between WWI & the rise of the Nazis. Karl Mannheim's Wissenssoziologie ([Sociology of Knowledge] Neuwied/Berlin: Luchterhand, 1964) & Max Scheler's "Weltanschauungslehre, Soziologie und Weltanschauungssetzung" ([Teaching Worldview, Sociology, and Acquiring Worldview] Kölner Vierteljahreshefte für Sozialwissenschaften II, 1922, 1, 18-33) illustrate the main contributions to modern SofK at that time. The reinforcement of cultural nihilism & relativism due to the downfall of the German Empire was the main focus of the social & cultural crisis. Scheler maintained the existence of an absolute & eternal domain of cultural values, while Mannheim stressed the historical & relativistic character of all human values & types of knowledge. The political character of Mannheim's sociology is emphasized to show that his version of SofK involved not only a specific field of research, but also a basic contribution to a full analysis of the cultural antinomies of modernity. He also provided an intellectual means for channeling the struggles of the time toward peaceful ways of resolving conflicts & achieving high levels of social self-reflection & cultural integration. 70 References. ¶ José Vasconcelos's philosophy of aesthetics of "coordination," first developed in Esthetica ([Aesthetics] Mexico: Edit. Botas, 1945 (1936)), posits that cognitive elements cannot be reduced to abstraction & logic, except through such forms as rhythm, melody, harmony, & counterpoint.

These forms obey a system of action, ie, an a priori aesthetic. Per Vasconcelos, knowledge is not reduced to thought of the exercise of reason; the processes of vital activity are not seperated from the material physical process, & thus, nonhuman animals can have knowledge. In general, his formulation of the concepts concerning the methodology of knowledge & the classification of the sciences (into physics, ethics, & aesthetics) is irrational & shows a strong mystical tendency. 26 References. ¶ Norbert Elias's The Symbol Theory (see IRPS No. 64/92c01602) & other recent works have engaged repeatedly in arguments against epistemology, favoring instead a process-sociological theory. Elias's antiphilosophical approach, including his rejection of subject/object dualism & the homo clausus concept, is linked to the Marburg school, an important faction of neo-Kantianism. Ernst Cassirer's Substanzbegriff und Funktionsbegriff: Untersuchungen über die Grundlagen der Erkenntniskritik ([The Concept of Substance and Structures: Studies on the Foundations of the Critique of Knowledge] Berlin, 1910) had a profound influence on Elias. His epistemology, based on the idea that advances in knowledge depend on a transition from substantialism to rational thought, was reflected in Elias's Het civilisatieproces: Sociogenetische en psychogenetische onderzoekingen ([The Civilizing Process: Sociogenetic and Psychogenetic Studies] Utrecht, 1982 [see also IRPS No. 16/83c00199 & 83c00200]). However, Elias felt that the concept of substance could not be abandoned altogether. A radical revision of Elias's sociological model is needed. 99 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ While connectionist networks are shown to be poor substitutes for theories of human cognitive functions or simulations of such theories, it is argued that connectionist modeling will help generate new theories of cognitive processing. Taking as an example a particularly well-developed model (Seidenberg, M. S., & McClelland, J. L., "A Distributed, Developmental Model of Word Recognition and Renaming," Psychological Review, 1989, 96, 523-568), it is shown that connectionist networks do in fact promise to enhance understanding of certain aspects of human cognition, including content-addressable memory, learning, categorization, & the effects of brain damage. Two caveats are underscored, however: the time & effort needed to progress from connectionist models to theory are unknown, & the terms in which a constructivist theory should be stated are as yet unspecified. 43 References. ¶ It is argued that postmodernity is simply the most recent ideology or modernity, & that the postmodern condition represents a semblance of intellectual culture & spirituality in a world increasingly dominated by the fetishism of things & images. As a radicalized version of late modernity, postmodernity reaffirms the aesthetic justification for life & dissolves not only the old institutional structures of modernity, but morality & history as well. The implications of postmodernity's abandonment of values, of totalizing systems of thought, & of the idea of progress are discussed, & it concluded that postmodernity sublimates the psychological stress & spiritual unease of modernity. Postmodernity's nefariousness can be countered only by reestablishing historical consciousness. 17 References. W. Howard

¶ The humanities generally include study about man & society, & can be classified on the basis of their method of study & their stratification. Universal decimal classification is a useful tool for organizing the knowledge gained from the various branches of the humanities. The USSR joined this system of classification relatively recently, in 1962. Previously, a library-bibliographic classification system (Bibliotechno-bibliograficheskaya klassifikatsiya), heavily influenced by Marxist ideology, had been used. Recent modifications to the classificational schemes are reviewed. 2 Tables, 8 References. M. Meeks

¶ The Sinhalas of Sri Lanka practice demonism to rid victims of malign supernaturals. Attempting to trace the genealogy of the conceptual assumptions behind this practice, the question is explored of how the Christian concept of demonism can become the organizing concept for the anthropological analysis of such non-Western beliefs as those of the Sinhalas. It is concuded that the determinate histories of specific anthropological objects must be traced if one is to appreciate the ideological conditions of the conceptual metaphors employed in cultural analyses. 90 References. ¶ The growing application of the neoclassical paradigm has received harsh criticism in several quarters where it is regarded as both excessively selfish & amoral. It is said to ignore the communitarian nature of human life & the moral dimension of human motivation; at a policy level it is thought to overemphasize private interests at the expense of public ideas. Some social scientists have sought a new, more encompassing paradigm that includes cognitive processes & the role of affect & values, individual processes & group structures, & symbolic factors. The new paradigm stipulates that: the independent variables in any proposition of socioeconomic theory have to include at least one noneconomic & one economic variable; competition is a subsystem embedded within a societal context that contains values, power relations, & social relations; individual choices are shaped by values, emotions, & knowledge, & inductive & deductive studies are coequal with respect to methodological standing. The paradigm also states that socioeconomics is both a positive & a normative science, & that is does not entail a commitment to any one ideological position but is open to a range of positions that treat economic behavior as involving the whole person & all facets of society. The evolution of the Society for the Advancement of Socio-Economics founded at the Harvard Business School in 1989, & its promotion of scholarship in the field of socioeconomics are discussed. Courses in socioeconomic management, in which the societal, cultural, & political contexts of an organization's existence are provided, as well as graduate departments that will train socioeconomic doctoral candidates, are recommmended. 14 References. ¶ An account is given of explanatory practice in which explanations are viewed as answers to questions requiring explanation. Using a structuralist account of theory structure, it is argued that theories are complex & evolving entities formed around a conceptual core & a set of intended applications, contending that this view does better justice to theories that involve a number of different kinds of theory elements to give narrative explanations. Theories can serve as devices to turn explanation-requiring questions into a form that allows assessment of potential answers. Evolutionary theories, both in Charles Darwin's & the modern synthetic forms, are used as examples. The view advanced is that modern evolutionary theory need not have a unique core to which other theories serve as "subcontractors." 43 References. Adapted from the source document.

Sohn, David (Dept Psychology U North Carolina, Charlotte 28223), Knowledge in Psychological Science: That of Process or of Population?, The Journal of Psychology, 1992, 126, 1, Jan, 5-16.

¶ Implicit in the utterances of psychologists are two opposing views of the nature of relationships, & thus of the nature of psychological science's subject matter: (1) the process model, which maintains that relationships in psychology are assertions of intraindividual processes common to all human beings; & (2) the population model, which holds that relationships are statements about statistical properties (eg, the mean) of populations. It is argued here that the process model is consistent with the aspirations of many if not most scientists, & provides a logical base for psychological science. In contrast, the population model leads to an unreasonable view of the nature of relationships, foreordains the impossibility of logically justifying the belief in the stability of psychological knowledge, & leads to a number of needless concerns in scientific research. 18 References. ——, Review Symposium: Anthony Giddens on Modernity, Theory, Culture & Society, 1992, 9, 2, May, 141-169. Comment, 171-174.

¶ A review essay on a book by: Anthony Giddens, The Consequences of Modernity (Cambridge: Polity Press, 1990 [see listing in IRPS No. 66]). In Weber, Giddens and Modernity, Bryan S. Turner (U of Essex, Colchester, England) examines how Max Weber's sociology stands in relation to Anthony Giddens's view of the limitation of classical sociology. Gidden's book argues that classical sociology was inadequate for analyzing modern social processes–a claim that, Turner argues, does not apply to Weber's work. In Modernity and the Postmodern, Guy E. Swanson (U of California, Berkeley) focuses on Giddens's conception of postmodernism & the causal processes that gave rise to it. Giddens identifies four trends that he believes are symptomatic not of the arrival of postmodernism, but of the global spread of capitalism, industrialism, administrative centralization, & apparatuses of surveillance. The Consequences of Modernity is criticized for making unsubstantiated claims regarding the sense of foreboding in modern societies. In Globality and Modernity, Roland Robertson (U of Pittsburgh, Pa) critically reviews Giddens's call for an "institutional study of modernity," which, it is claimed, is never realized due to Giddens's preoccupations with phenomenological, utopian, & psychological modes of analysis. Moreover, Giddens is assailed for failing to meet the standards of a truly multidimensional approach, inadequately rendering the complexities of contemporary institutions, & neglecting the importance of culture. In How Modern Is Modern Society?, Ulrich Beck (Bamberg U, Federal Republic of Germany) takes up the issue of "reflexive modernization" in this & another of Giddens's works, Modernity and Self-Identity (Oxford: Polity Press, 1991 [see listing in IRPS No. 66]. Against Giddens, it is argued that industrial society is only half-modern because its two forms of work–employment & domestic labor–are interconnected, the first being modern, the latter antimodern. In Commentary on the Reviews, Giddens defends his view that Weber's methodological writings are deeply flawed & his concept of bureacracy is obsolete, & contends that it is not possible to derive an analysis of "institutional reflexivity" from Weber's work. Also, Giddens rejects Robertson's claim that he draws on the ideas of Talcott Parsons & Jeffrey Alexander to expound an account of institutional differentiation. W. ¶ A review article on a book by Lawrence A. Scaff, Fleeing the Iron Cage: Culture, Politics, and Modernity in the Thought of Max Weber (Berkeley: U of California Press, 1989 [see listing in IRPS No. 66]). Scaff attempts to dispense with critical & analytical discussions of Max Weber & focus on the historical Weber, his intellectual milieu, & his version of Wissenschaft, asserting that there is a significant difference between Weber's project as he perceived it & scholars' interpretations of it. Scaff focuses on Weber's individualism & the heroic ethic around which he organized not only his scholarly interests, but also his political ambitions. An engaging analysis of Weber's relationship with Georg Simmel, & of Weber's unique brand of existentialism, is also offered. Scaff's book is criticized, however, for focusing too heavily on Weber's intellectual circle at the expense of other important issues, eg, his nationalism. W. ¶ A review essay on a book by Luc Ferry & Alain Renaut, Heidegger and Modernity (Philip, Franklin [Tr], Chicago: U of Chicago Press, 1990 [see listing in IRPS No. 66]). This book challenges the view that Martin Heidegger was susceptible to German National Socialist ideology, because his early work was mired in humanism & subjectivism. Salient themes in Heidegger's Being and Time (Macquarie & Robinson [Trs], New York: Yale U Press, 1959) are briefly discussed, & Ferry's & Renaut's reading of Heidegger's affiliation with Nazism is compared with that of Lacoue-Labarthe's (Heidegger, Art and Politics: The Fiction of the Political, Turner [Tr], Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1990). It is contended that Lacoue-Labarthe's claim that Nazism is a humanism is unfounded, & that the Ferry/Renaut book, though well argued, does not succeed in proving that Heidegger's analysis of "being-in-the-world" owed its philosophical force to the Enlightenment, particularly Kantian philosophy. Heidegger's understanding of the relationship of technology, modernity, & being is discussed, as is the status of his philosophy & politics within US & French academic circles. 16 References. W. Interview conducted by Paul Gordon.

¶ Cornelius Castoriadis discusses his view of Sigmund Freud, his development as a practicing psychoanalyst, & his understanding of the concepts of sublimation & cathexis. Castoriadis maintains that Freudian theory has many blind spots, of which the most salient are its inattention to the effects of sociohistorical institutions on the psyche & its underdevelopment of the notions of radical imagination & creative indetermination. A critic of Lacanian psychoanalysis, Castoriadis offers insights into psychoanalytic politics in France & takes Jacques Lacan to task for his assertion that the unconscious is structured as a language. Castoriadis suggests that the ascendancy of Lacanian psychoanalysis–& deconstruction in general–is indicative of an epoch in which intellectual fashions have taken the place of rigorous thought & scholarship. ¶ The contemporary status of the concept of democracy in Western social & political thought is examined via an analysis of the work of Jean-François Lyotard & Jürgen Habermas. Lyotard's critique of Habermas's concept of legitimation crisis is critically evaluated with extensive reference to Lyotard's Postmodern Condition (Minneapolis: U of Minneapolis Press, 1984 [1979]). Lyotard argues that Habermas's theory of legitimation presented in Theory of Communicative Action (see IRPS No. 41/88c00923) is flawed because it adheres to the possibility of consensus as the basis for legitimacy & because it does not allow for the heterogeneity of language games. Lyotard & other postmodern theorists view democracy as a set of procedural & institutional mechanisms that no longer apply to the political & cultural realities that have arisen in Western societies. In contrast, Habermas sees the ideals of democracy as attainable through the development of rational communication. It is suggested that for democracy to remain a vital concept, power must be shifted from politics & the economy to increasingly larger portions of the populations. 74 References. W. Howard

¶ Examined is the contemporary situation in which the postmodern is increasingly viewed as the end of transformative politics. Ludic postmodernism (ie, a crisis in the mode of signification) & strands of recent feminist theory tend to limit their analyses to the micropolitics of oppression at the local level, thus precluding effective political intervention in totalities such as patriarchy. An emancipatory politics that strives to transform structures of oppression is possible only through intervention in the structures of oppression at the micropolitical level & of in different manifestations of oppression at the macropolitical level. Resistance postmodernism & postmodern materialist feminism can end patriarchal exploitation by developing a transformative theory & practice. 35 References. W. Howard

Yet such Whiggish interpretations of the "revolution" have involved making some suspect general conclusions about a new, standard rationality of conduct & a new norm suitable for constructed science. Furthermore, commonly accepted generalizations about the advent & spread of the industrial revolution are not well supported by the available evidence, especially where the case has been linked to an indistinct "science." ¶ T. R. Young has argued (see SA 40:4/92Z1527) that in postmodern social science, truth is entirely a human creation, thus subjective & therefore neither absolute nor final. It is contended here that Young has confused the line between epistemology, which may be creative & subjective, given its human-centered frame of reference, & ontology, which must ultimately be regarded as absolute, given that it is a description of the way the universe is at any one time. The fundamental logical premise behind this argument is that there is only one way a thing can be at any one time; though it is true many people may see it in different ways, the fact of its being is unaltered by those perceptions. Social science must focus on this fact if it is to retain any semblance of scientific objectivity. 4 References. Adapted from the source document.

Hohn, Thomas, Jameson and Habermas, UM Telos, 1988, 75, spring, 103-123.

¶ Examined are the aesthetic theories found in the work of Fredric Jameson (eg, see The Political Unconscious: Narrative as a Socially Symbolic Act, Ithaca: Cornell U Press, 1981) & Jürgen Habermas ("Modernity versus Postmodernity" [see SA 30:4/82M4714]). Both authors offer aesthetic theories that retreat from the dialectic in Theodor W. Adorno's interpretation of modern artworks (in Ashton, E. B. (Tr), Negative Dialects, New York: Seabury Press, 1979), which posits that modernist works of art are both autonomous & social. Jameson's analysis of the symbolic structure of aesthetic artifacts is found wanting, as is his reduction of aesthetic experience to ideology. Habermas defends an enlightened project of modernity against the threats of postmodernity, & denies the legitimacy of autonomous art for any rationally organized society. It is concluded that the two aesthetic theories are symptoms of the postmodern condition rather than diagnoses of the problems of art in postmodernity. W. Howard

¶ In an introduction to this special issue (see related abstracts in SA 41:1) on "Transformative Discourses in Postmodern Social, Cultural & Legal Theory," an attempt is made to determine whether the differences between the world of law schools & contemporary humanities are enough to merit changes in the way that postmodern ideas are applied to the former. Surface differences between the two disciplinary worlds are acknowledged, & it is argued that legal academia, traditional humanist literary studies, & poststructuralist cultural studies ultimately necessitate & reproduce ideological closure by articulating either the "unendedness" of "interpretational play" or the pragmatic obligation to cover more material. It is further argued that a third modality of critical theory is needed to counter "first world" (ie, original formulations of poststructuralist ideas) deconstructionist analytics that have moved from a position of voiceless otherness to one of predominance. ¶ Existential psychology psychoanalysis, & philosopher Martin Heidegger, posit that the primary human repression is death-fear. It is argued that Heidegger's Being and Time misses "the return of the repressed" in symoblic form, &overlooks how future-oriented temporality can become "a schema for the expiation of guilt." Heidegger's authentic & inauthentic ways of experiencing time are both reactions to the inevitable possibility of death. To see how time might be experienced without the shadow of death, Heidegger's approach is contrasted with the Buddhist deconstruction of time, which denies the commonsense duality between self & time. 25 References. ¶ Seven contemporary theoretical traditions have contributed to the demise of homo economicus: postindustrial sociology; the antiutilitarian ethics of modern social contract theorists, eg, John Rawls; the democratic theory of C. B. MacPherson; Jürgen Habermas's historical philosophy of culture; Cambridge-style political economics; economic anthropology; & the comparative cultural anthropology of Louis Dumont. Each of these traditions' explicit rejection of the image of economic man is discussed, & it is contended that the death of homo economicus has three ideological consequences for the social sciences: the negation of the idea of progress, the weakening of individualism, & skepticism of objective knowledge. Because of these adverse effects, it is suggested that homo economicus deserves resuscitation as both a paradigm of human choice making & as a highly useful ideal type. W. Howard

Habermas's intellectual indebtedness to the work of Stanley Kohlberg is examined, as are Habermas's references to the work of the jurisprudential scholar Ronald Dworkin. It is maintained that, given the valid criticisms of Kohlberg's theory of moral development, Dworkin's theories of judicial interpretation & integrity can be used to supplement Habermas's theory of communicative action. Habermas's linguistic turn toward discourse theory is accounted for, & the influence of Max Weber on Habermas's understanding of rationality is discussed. It is concluded that Habermas's discourse theory could profit by taking into account the many insights of Max Weber's theory of individual morality. 22 References. W. Howard

¶ A description of a conflict over the use of forest resources in the district of Ixtlán, Mexico, that began in 1981. Since 1956, rights to these resources were held by the Fabrica de Papel Tuxtepec, as awarded to them by presidential decree. In 1981, when the decree expired, a coalition of several town governments challenged these groups' right to control forest resources by opposing the renewal of the decree, & forming, in 1983, the Unidad de Aprovechamiento Forestal (UAF). The UAF controlled the sale of wood from public land & returned the profit to local residents. The conflict then escalated; strategies of each group to regain control are described. It is concluded that the political elite, despite its power within the region, has failed to eliminate the opposition's control of the UAF due to new political strategies on the part of the opposition that involve calling on federal- & state-level legal challenges to the elite's tactics. ¶ It is argued that the concept of community has been misused by sociologists to describe almost all social institutions, confusing social interaction with the persistence of tradition. Here, the community is defined as a social phenomenon that can only be attained in a microworld infused with the permanence of tradition. The communitarian perspective is explored, & the structure & significance of tradition described. This perspective is then compared to the ambiguity of most modern life. Implications for maintaining a sense of community in modern life are considered. Adapted from the source document as translated by J. Taylor. A Comparison of Selected Results from Monographical Studies of Two Villages), Sociologický Časopis, 1992, 28, 4, 528-542. (CZE)

¶ The Agricultural U of Prague, Czechoslovakia, is trying to revive the old tradition of producing historical sociological monographs as a legacy of Czech rural sociology. Goals include: (1) analysis of the present state of rural communites; (2) evaluation of their history & their future development; & (3) development of a typology of villages. The political, economic, & socialization of rural communities is discussed in light of the revitalization of villages since the downfall of communism in 1989. In this light a contrastive analysis is presented of two unnamed villages near the German & Austrian border. Originally their demographic profile was similar. However, in one village, significant changes occurred after WWII with the transfer of Sudenten Germans to Germany. This village is now likely to attain a suburban character, while the other village is moving in the direction of reinstituting its traditional rural culture. In both cases, success depends on local initiative & encouragement of development & planning. In general, Czech villages are weak, lacking sufficient internal strength to pull themselves up solely by their own initiative. 2 Tables, 10 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Eyewitness & other descriptive accounts are drawn on to explore the historical relationships between ironworkers & peasants of Geita & other districts in colonial Tanzania, focusing on their material, cultural, & symbolic practices, as well as their interaction with merchants, native authorities, & the colonial state. It is argued that these ironworkers & peasants, in providing for their social reproduction, confronted the daily challenges of existence through both material (economic) & ideological (cultural) means–at once resisting & accommodating the terms of domination & incorporation. ¶ A broad panorama of social & economic characteristics of the ten US & Mexican states along the nations' international border is presented, based on statistical data compiled for 1900-1990 by the U of California at Los Angeles. It is argued that these ten states are interrelated by such strong social, cultural, & economic ties that they can be said to constitute a single region. An attempt is made to describe the interaction between these cultures quantitatively. 24 Tables. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An exploration of the political efficacy of pursuing public policies & political campaigns that would address the problem of working poverty in the US. Having demonstrated that nearly 30 million workers & their families live below minimum standards of self-sufficiency, whether political elites can receive voter approval for policies that can alleviate this problem is considered. Moderate increases in the minimum wage & a liberalized earned income tax credit are two programs that, combined, would lift working families out of real poverty, at a cost of $20 billion, a sum that would not require increased taxes & is less than 50% of President Bush's requested peace dividend. Data from previous national public opinion polls & the 1989 General Social Survey are used to examine the likely outcome of the 1988 presidential race had the Democratic candidate aggressively championed such policies. Taking into account income levels, attitudes about assistance to the poor, & a range of additional cross-pressures that typically operate on voter decisions, it is contended that the potential of such a campaign would have been substantial. ¶ Similar to other laws regulating organizations, equal employment opportunity & affirmative action mandates do not clearly define what constitutes compliance. Thus, compliance depends largely on the initiative & agenda of those persons within organizations who are charged with managing the compliance effort: in the case of civil rights, affirmative action officers. Here, case studies of such officers are drawn on to suggest that the political climate within which they work, together with their interpretations of the law, role conceptions, & professional aspirations, have important implications for the nature & extent of organizational compliance with law. It is concluded that compliance should be understood as a process that evolves over time rather than as a discrete event. 40 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A comparative analysis of the practice of occupational health & safety regulation in GB & West Germany, focusing on the specific relationship that regulatory agencies & the concerned interest groups, employers, & trade unions, develop in the stages of policy formulation & implementation. Data obtained during interviews with persons involved in health & safety at various trade unions, companies, & regulatory authorities (total N = 210) indicate that interest groups actively participate in the regulation-making systems in both countries. The policy they pursue in this process is influenced & mediated by their actual resources as well as by individual views & assessments of each side's representatives. In Germany, a strong fragmentation with numerous private & quasi-governmental bodies entitled to formulate standards makes it difficult for interest groups to concentrate on the competent & important committees. In contrast, there is a clearer responsibility of bodies & committees in GB. In both countries, enforcement policy prefers an advisory & persuasive style even though the legal backgrounds are quite different. 29 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Variables within categories intended to explain drinking behavior are examined to assess their relative impact on collegiate drinking differentials, using survey data for 230 undergraduates from a large university in La & 172 from a small liberal arts college in Iowa. Findings provide little support for the notion that respondents (Rs) attending school within a subcultural area noted for its emphasis on drinking (ie, Cajuns from the culturally distinct area of Acadiana) are affected by such normative variations. While Rs from La reported slightly higher mean rates of drinks per drinking occasion & number of drinking days per month, the La monthly volume rates were lower than those for Rs from Iowa. Evidence indicates that the higher number of abstainers in the Iowa group is due to religious beliefs rather than the illegality of the behavior. Age regulations may also reduce the frequency of drinking occasions & increase the amount consumed per occasion by those who are under age & continue to drink. 3 Tables, 1 Appendix, 15 References. Several types of employers are exempt from this regulation; others pay a special tax if their proportion of handicapped workers falls below 4%. The proceeds from this tax are ostensibly used to help the handicapped. However, analysis reveals that in spite of the growth in this fund from 154 million to 353.7 million schillings 1981-1989, about 75% of the tax fund is recycled to firms in the way of awards for achieving goals of hiring handicapped workers. Several reasons why the measure lost by a 3.5 to 1 margin are discussed: the city overestimated the shortage of child-care slots, supporters of the measure underestimated the opposition, & the city council & public opinion polls overestimated the willingness of voters to pay for public support of child care. 4 Tables, 25 References. Bobo, Lawrence (Dept Sociology U Wisconsin, Madison 53706), Prejudice and Alternative Dispute Resolution, Studies in Law, Politics, and Society, 1992, 12(Part A), 147-176.

¶ Two central questions are addressed concerning the role that racial attitudes & beliefs may play in the processing of legal disputes: (1) factors that might influence willingness to bring complaints of discrimination, particularly whether traditional court proceedings or alternative forms of dispute resolution (ADR), might elicit more pursuit of legal redress for such grievances; & (2) the issue of whether antiminority prejudice, particularly against blacks, would be a more serious problem in ADR than in traditional court forums. Both inquiries are discussed in the context of the larger controversy over ADR. Whether ADR will encourage minorities to bring their grievances to legal forums remains unclear, even though discrimination is widespread. Recourse to informal & more expeditious methods of dispute resolution would probably facilitate more frequent pursuit of discrimination claims. As a result, ADR may enhance the mobilization of law to protect the rights of minorities, assuming that information about ADR is widely disseminated, & ADR perceived as effective. However, ADR focuses attention on resolving disputes between individuals, & in many instances, the underlying issue is one of group status or categorical treatment. 98 References. S. Millett

¶ An examination of claims made in behalf of dispute-centered research as an analytic approach to understanding social relationships & as a prescription for altering them through the establishment of alternatives to legal disputing mechanisms. It is argued that the analysis of disputes, abstracted from context & social theory, lacks a frame of reference that permits inquiry into social & political relationships. An alternative theoretical framework is outlined that treats disputes as a subject of politically & institutionally ordered relationships. This framework is applied to an analysis of the political & institutional boundaries that organize disputing over the meaning of welfare rights, focusing on: the indeterminacy of rights; the bureaucratic construction of the meaning of rights; & conditions that influence the capacity of poor citizens to identify, articulate, & pursue alternative conceptions of their rights. 75 References. ¶ An analytic framework is developed for examining the processing of disputes in official bureaucracies. The model advances a social-constructionist concept of disputes & their processing that directs attention to how official intervention in activities actually creates disputes & gives them particular form. Primary focus is on official interventions that recognize & preserve a core element of conflict, & treat matters at issue as disputes. Following a critical review of the dispute transformation approach, the analysis shifts to consideration of the activities of public bureaucrats as outside parties intervening in, & disposing of, those disputes that come to their attention. It is suggested that the key to the process of intervention lies in when & how officials come to make inquiries about, understand, & ultimately align themselves in regard to dispute & the parties to it. 59 References. ¶ The politics of public-sector mediation & mediation-bashing are explored, addressing questions of public dispute resolution (PDR) practice by examining themes of democratic political theory. A research agenda is proposed that reflects the responsibility of political philosophy in PDR processes. It is suggested that planners & public managers, as well as mediators & facilitators managing PDR efforts, seek deliberative processes that produce enduring agreements, while also being properly representative & sensitive to power imbalances. The character of public participation & political deliberation, characterized as the central values of modern republican politics, is discussed, research questions that explore mediators' judgments about power & representation are addressed, & the adequacy of predominantly empiricist approaches to the study of PDR is challenged. 113 References. ¶ An examination of the public function of civil courts, & of the public aspects of "private" courts, ie, private mediation, considering how various tribunals might function as private courts, whether it may be desirable to have them, & in what ways they should be private or public. Many such courts vary in their privateness, but virtually all contain significant public elements (as public courts encompass important private aspects). Consequently, it is contended that the policy issue is not whether cases should be processed by public or private courts, but rather, what dimensions of courts should be public or private. The need for research & regulation focused on specific characteristics of particular tribunals is emphasized. 1 Table, 44 References. S. Millett

Garth, Bryant G., Privatization and the New Market for Disputes: A Framework for Analysis and a Preliminary Assessment, Studies in Law, Politics, and Society, 1992, 12(Part B), 367-391.

¶ In a discussion of private disputing, it is suggested that developments both outside & inside the courts must be viewed as related, & that national developments must be consided in relationship to transnational dispute phenomena. It is further argued that if the test for market success at the highest level is going to be the ability to gain the business of big business, then big business is bound to purchase services that serve private goals; it therefore makes sense to speak in terms of privatization. Given that both personal & business relationships are shaped by the information that institutions for dispute processing generate, an important issue is the extent to which particular kinds of relationships will draw on, or avoid, state-generated norms. The competition in disputing entities appears to be reducing the flow of information that permits informed questioning of business & bureaucratic behavior, bolstering private ordering with little public scrutiny. It is concluded that the likely results of the privatizing trend depend on too many variables to predict their outcome with certainty. Instead of assessing private courts, whether & why they are winning in the marketplace should be considered, as well as what the impacts will be on both public & private mechanisms. 86 References. S. ¶ An analysis of disputing in organizations, based on research & theory about people's encounters with organizations, rather than the traditional dispute processing literature. Following a brief introduction defining key terms, focus shifts to the existence of a "dispute paradox" in organizations, ie: although disputes are natural, normal, & perhaps even healthy components of organizations, they are usually taken as indicators of organizational failure. Exemplars of current research on disputing in organizations are provided, & five directions for future research suggested, emphasizing the fifth, ie, the utility of distinguishing the structure of interaction among groups of organizational actors, called mass contact vs individualized contact. 1 Table, 62 References. ¶ A review of papers presented in this volume (see abstracts for both Part A & Part B in SA 41:1). The predisposition toward democratic social change observed among the authors parallels recent law & society writing that has been critical of research privileging those in power. The criticism has not been directed toward theory alone, but has had a strong antipositivist, even antiscience, theme, arguing that normal science methodology privileges the views of an academic elite & its audience. This critical tradition calls for a reversal of privilege by adopting research methods & theory that empower the submerged voices in society. It is suggested that the critics' concerns about science methodology point to further questions that must be asked about the interests & perspectives that will inevitably be represented in any research, & about who will ultimately benefit from it. Restated in conclusion is a theme largely shared by the authors--a shift from dispute- to conflict-centered theory. 24 References. S. Millett

¶ US courts are changing, responding to revenue shortfalls & increasing demands for services by placing new emphasis on resolving disputes before trial. These initiatives privilege less visible, less accountable modes of dispute resolution over courtroom trials, which are regarded by many judges, lawyers, & policymakers as an unproductive use of judicial resources. Trials, however, are the only occasion in which members of the public observe or participate in adjudication. It is contended that privatization within the third (judicial) branch has significant long-term implications for the courts & society, even more perhaps than the shift toward privatization of other public services. Privatization in the third branch is linked to the movement toward privatization of other public services, & it is shown how this shift has been encouraged by legislative initiatives, executive inaction, & active encouragement within the judiciary & the legal profession. Courts, it is suggested, are being positioned to play a lesser role in policy making & citizen education than they have in the recent past. 1 Appendix, 70 References. AA

¶ A commentary on articles by Robert Emerson, Barbara Gutek, & Evelyn Brodkin (see abstracts in this section of SA 41:1), which offer insight into the relationship between organization dynamics & the disputing process, in particular, how organizations generate & distribute the resources that condition when voices of dissent or conflict are made more or less intelligible or effective. Organizational structures are shown to influence dispute formation & process by generating opportunities for disputes by constructing & recognizing social identities & roles that give voice to grievances, & by locating & legitimating the organizational expertise & knowledge necessary to mount a challenge to conventional interpretations of organizational action. Dimensions of comparison are outlined that show how power & organization interact to influence the formation of disputes & the framing of social agendas. Suggestions are offered about significant organizational & interorganizational dimensions of disputing that can be used to compare organizations as dispute sites. 1 Reference. S. Millett

¶ A framework for thinking about ethnic conflicts & their management is presented that emphasizes the critical role of both interests & psychocultural interpretations. Establishing links among diverse audiences & bringing attention to central theories about ethnicity & ethnic conflict would encourage scholars to think more systematically about dispute management. In many situations of inequality & oppression, increasing conflict (& even violence) is often the only route to long-term political change. Often conflicts that could be managed constructively are not, because those involved do not know how to do so. It is contended that, while the theoretical questions of ethnic conflict & conflict management are often discussed in isolation, building clearer linkages between the two is an important theoretical & policy-making goal. 2 Tables, 124 References. ¶ It is argued that theories of race relations & conflict resolution that have been influential during the 1980s, & are based essentially on methodological individualism--rational choice, sociobiology, & human needs--should be rejected in favor of a power analysis of race relations. This approach, building on certain insights of Max Weber & J. Furnivall, returns power to the center of the analysis & provides a key to understanding the dynamics of ethnic conflict in deeply divided societies. A case study is offered in conclusion, focusing on present-day South Africa, about which it is suggested that attempts to resolve situations of unequal power, rather than striving to influence the balance of power, are doomed to failure. 45 References. ¶ US & Japanese concepts of legalism, particularly approaches to dispute resolution, are discussed. Though Japan has adopted a western system of civil law, its legal culture differs considerably from that of the US, which is characterized by legal pluralism, diversity, suspicion of centralized power, assertion of individual rights, the use of law as neutral tool to protect rights & interests of individuals, & the top priority of observing legal rules & regulations. The Japanese legal culture is characterized by obedience to authority, homogeneity, subordination of individual rights to the group, viewing law as an intrusion, & placing little credence on the vale of abstract written law. The distinction between adoption of a systematic code of laws & implementation of that system as written is discussed. D. Generoli

Adler, Frank, Telos, 1968 and Now, UM Telos, 1988, 75, spring, 52-55.

¶ The emergence of the journal Telos out of the political & social unrest of the 1960s is examined. From its beginning in the department of philosophy at the State U of New York, Buffalo, Telos's objective was to recapture & then reconstitute the bases for a distinctly Western, emancipatory Marxism that would have its roots in the critical theory of Antonio Gramsci, Theodor W. Adorno, & Herbert Marcuse. Although Telos rapidly acquired a reputation as a journal that took the teachings of continental philosophy seriously, many US scholars decried the journal's unwillingness to address distinctively US political problems & to offer an agenda for political radicalism. Hanna, Joseph F. (Michigan State U, East Lansing 48824), Critical Theory and the Politicization of Science, UM Communication Monographs, 1991, 58, 2, June, 202-212.

¶ Critical theorists have argued that the classic empiricist model of social science, which attempts to subsume social phenomena under general covering laws & theories, leads to the scientization of politics. According to this critique, political decisions are arrived at through the instrumental logic of technical reason rather than through communicative consensus. These arguments are rebutted by pointing to the concomitant danger of the politicization of science that results from the view that it is possible for social science to provide an objective, transcendental critique of social & political institutions. It is argued that the scientization of politics attributed to the empiricist model of social science is largely due to the ascendancy of a conceptual realist perspective that misrepresents the goals & objective limits of scientific research. The solution is to renew the spirit of enlightened positivism, taking into consideration the significant contributions of the Wittgensteinian critique of the logical empiricist tradition. 18 References. Piccone, Paul, 20 Years of Telos, UM Telos, 1988, 75, spring, 3-25.

¶ Reflections are offered by the current editor on the twenty-year history of Telos, an academic journal devoted to Western Marxism & critical theory. Founded by a group of graduate students at the State U of New York, Buffalo, Telos began as an effort to revitalize US philosophy in the late 1960s by rediscovering European thought & Western Marxism. Telos's early rejection of the structuralism of Louis Althusser is accounted for, as is the journal's interest in phenomenology, GB philosophy of science, & critical theory. As Telos began to develop its project of a phenomenologically-grounded critical theory, the New Left began to disintegrate, rendering the journal a political orphan. During the 1970s & 1980s, the focus of Telos shifted to the new historicism, theories of modernization, & the rejuvenation of critical theory via the work of Jurgen Habermas. W. ¶ A position statement on contemporary critical theory & its relationship to the postmodern problem. Critical theory requires a critical deployment of its arguments, & a reflexive recognition of its ideological commitment, different from that of objectivism. Critical theory's stance of engaged skepticism equating critique with social action, a kind of revolutionary praxis, has developed from its intellectual & practical history with origins in the Frankfurt school. Often identified with critical theory, poststructuralism is less effective with the Frankfurt style of critique. Postmodernism challenges contemporary critical theory to produce an ethical course of action in which poststructuralism's real & nonrepressive politics are emanicipated in a historicized discourse. 30 References. ¶ It is argued that Jürgen Habermas's critical theory (eg, Dews, Peter [Ed], Autonomy and Solidarity: Interviews, New York: Verso, 1986) uses pragmatist insights into communicative rationality & democratic ethos, but does not consider other aspects of pragmatism. Here, the pragmatist perspective on experience & indeterminancy is incorporated into critical theory, offering a pragmatist alternative to Habermas's theory of communicative action (see IRPS No. 41/88c00922 & 88c00923). The following themes are discussed: disembodied reason vs embodied reasonableness, determinate being vs indeterminate reality, discursive truth vs pragmatic certainty, rational consensus vs reasonable dissent, transcendental democracy vs democratic transcendence, & rational society vs sane community. These concerns are consistent with broadly based trends in modern science; implications for future sociology are considered. 119 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Based on Antonio Gramsci's discussion (Hoare, Q., & Smith, G. [Eds & Trs], Selections from the Prison Notebooks, New York: International Publishers, 1971) of the contributions of organic (vs traditional) intellectuals, & their emancipatory potential for political action, the features shared between critical theory & cultural critique as praxis are explored. Situating the Frankfurt school founders among a class of notable organic intellectuals, the dialectical origins of critical theory are sketched. Gramsci's theories of cultural materialism were influential on poststructuralist critical theorists, who focused on texts & contexts. Assuming that all cultural texts or discourses are facts of power, more recent in-process critical theory emphasizes an independent, oppositional stance that coexists with challenges posed by local affiliative power. The future of critical theory lies in an examination of diversified forms of local praxis, evolving social conditions & provisional intervention. 32 References. J. ¶ To illuminate differences between the perception of man-made threats (activities, substances, & technologies) & natural hazards (diseases & natural disasters), 106 first-year psychology students at a Norwegian university were asked to rank 75 man-made & natural hazards on a scale of 0-100 in terms of their level of "riskiness." Perception of natural risk is found to be somewhat similar to that of man-made risk in that two dimensions are used to assess risk, regardless of type: potency & activity. Perception of natural risks, however, is also found to be analyzed in terms of a third dimension, ie, novelty. The Norwegian Ss' attitudes toward risk (unlike those of Americans) are found to be less fixated on natural hazards precisely because the level of risk cannot be determined. 7 Tables, 29 References. ¶ A new research agenda for examination of public disputes is proposed, based on criticism of current dispute research for its failure to view disputes as reflecting the social conditions in which they are embedded, or as having outcomes that mirror the inequalities that give rise to them. It is argued that how power decides the fate of community-level conflict can best be assessed by applying a dynamic-historical approach that synthesizes the elitist & pluralist views of power. To apply this synthesis to community & environmental conflicts, an extension of the analytic & empirical scope is proposed that incorporates the notion of hierarchy of places of J. R. Logan & H. L. Molotch (Urban Fortunes: The Political Economy of Place, Berkeley: U of California Press, 1987). In laying out the research agenda, research on the structure of power in the US is reviewed, & the utility of a dynamic-historical approach is demonstrated by applying it to the forty-year Two Forks Dam controversy between environmentalists & the Denver (Colo) Water Board. 2 Tables, 107 References. ¶ Whether environmental conflicts, eg, over the siting of facilities, or impacts on natural resources, are an effective vehicle for community mobilization is examined, based on personal experience in making judgments on such issues. The impact of existing or alternative approaches to conflict resolution & the extent to which the public good should be addressed in such conflicts are also discussed. It is contended that environmental disputes may not lead to community empowerment, & may actually disempower poor or minority communities. It is concluded that, where there is debate over the public good, it is more likely to occur in terms of priorities rather than absolutes, & as a self-interested justification of positions taken, rather than any lofty notion of an independently defined public interest. 11 References. ¶ Following major droughts in the 1970s & 1980s, national & international development efforts were initiated to assist the pastoralist populations of Marsabit District, Kenya. Famine relief efforts by the Catholic Church & the African Inland Mission contributed to the settling of former nomads & the growth of small towns, while international development efforts, including UNESCO's Integrated Project in Arid Lands (IPAL), focused on range conservation & the improvement of livestock marketing. The sedentarization of pastoralists has led to greater access to health care, education, & other social services, but has also contributed to economic differentiation & rural proletarianization. Local economies are now based on a combination of subsistence pastoralism, livestock marketing, & wage labor, demonstrating the complexity of the sedentarization process & its varying consequences for different sectors of the population. 1 Figure, 24 References. Hogg, Richard (Third Livestock Development Project, PO Box 1502 Addis Ababa Ethiopia), Should Pastoralism Continue as a Way of Life?, Disasters, 1992, 16, 2, June, 131-137.

¶ Though most African governments consider pastoralism as environmentally destructive & even economically irrational, it is argued here that most allegations against pastoralism are unfounded. In most of the areas where it is practiced, it is the only way to survive in marginal, semiarid environments, & the majority of pastoralists have a deep respect & knowledge of their environment. The tragedy of contemporary pastoralism derives from a misunderstanding of the position & motivation of pastoralists who, often in extreme circumstances, are trying to come to terms with a rapidly changing political, economic, & natural environment. The most sensible pastoral development strategy is to provide a facilitative environment to support pastoralists in the particular range of activities they know best; any traditional, prescriptive "range management" approaches are likely to fail. 15 References. A major factor underlying problems with EE is found to be the faulty model on which it has been based. This anthropocentric viewpoint is linked to a Christian worldview. However, some nonanthropocentric viewpoints were expressed by Christian mystics & the Romanticists. A. Naess's "Sustainable Development and Deep Ecology" (in Ethics and Environment and Development, Engel, J. R., & Engel, J. G. [Eds], London, 1990) & P. Reed's "Man Apart: An Alternative to the Self-Realization Approach" (Environmental Ethics, 1989, 11, 53-69) pointed to ecological movements trying to draw as closely as possible to nature as a foundation for an ethical system stressing authenticity, spontaneity, & simplicity as cherished values. The adequacy of this model is questioned. 44 References. Adapted from the source document.

Long, Bill L. (Organization Economic Coordination & Development, 2 rue Andre Pascal F-75775 Paris Cedex 16 France), Desertification: In Perspective, UM Population and Environment, 1989, 10, 4, summer, 237-244.

¶ The international community has not addressed the critical environmental challenge presented by desertification for several reasons: desertification is an implacable adversary, making any antidesertification crusade long, difficult, frustrating, & costly; & the desertification concept is too ambiguous & diffuse, & therefore yields no consensus on what the critical indicators of desertification are. Despite substantial investments in mainstream desertification-control programs, the perceived absence of significant victories in these efforts has raised doubts in government ministries & budget authorities as to whether success is possible. It is argued that success will depend on a precise definition of what is meant by desertification & the continuing quest by the science & technology community for a better understanding of the desertification process. Additionally, affected countries must confront high population growth rates, inadequate land tenure systems that create disincentives to effective management, & civil conflicts. ¶ Forty-two areas of concern within the Great Lakes basin have been identified for immediate environmental rehabilitation in a comprehensive effort by the US & Canadian government. Here, the efficacy of the Remedial Action Plan (RAP) policy of the international Joint Commission on Hamilton, Ontario, one of the most seriously polluted areas within the Great Lakes, is examined. The RAP approach involves a wide variety of social actors from government, industry, academia, & environmental groups who deal with complex technical & social issues at a local level. It has been argued that this environmental program could serve as a model for countries attempting to implement the concept of sustainable development at the national & local levels. It is suggested that RAP has made impressive progress in attempting to create a situation where a healthy environment, a prosperous economy, & human well-being can exist simultaneously. However, RAP tends to look at the Hamilton Harbor as one integrated geographic entity of air, land, water, plants, animals, & humans when, in fact, the harbor ecosystem is not one political entity. Issues related to the federal, regional, & provincial jurisdictional complexity of the problem are discussed. It is concluded that the Hamilton Harbor RAP must be implemented & monitored, & that government & nongovernment agency commitment & funding must be formalized. 3 Figures, 19 References. McEwen, Craig A. (Dept Sociology Bowdoin Coll, Brunswick ME 04011), Environmental and Community Disputes: A Commentary, Studies in Law, Politics, and Society, 1992, 12(Part B), 331-341.

¶ Comments are offered on the papers by Penelope Canan, Gerald Cormick, John Forester, & Robert Percival (see abstracts in SA 41:1), all of which note that environmental & community conflicts are played out not just in courts, but also through administrative decision making, electoral & legislative politics, & even disruption & protest. This observation has significant implications for both the study & practice of dispute resolution. Most importantly, this vision of conflict as politics & collective behavior requires a conceptual model of disputing based on the interests & actions of groups or collectivities, rather than one based on the views, interests, & behavior of individuals. These papers highlight a fundamental disagreement about the values that should shape conflict & conflict resolution: in one view, the goal of conflict resolution is to enhance a sense of collective identity & solidarity, & to produce a sense of the common good; in the other, group or individual self-interest shape both conflict & its resolution. 18 References. Norton, Bryan (School Public Policy Georgia Instit Technology, Atlanta 33032), Sustainability, Human Welfare, and Ecosystem Health, Environmental Values, 1992, 1, 2, summer, 97-111.

¶ Two types of sustainability definitions & the assumptions on which they are based are contrasted. Social scientists posit a relationship between the present & future welfare of persons, while ecologists require protection of environmental processes for future sustainability. Drawing in part from each of these definitions, an alternative is proposed–scientific contextualism–which recognizes that short-term economic decisions must be balanced against long-term ecological decisions, but that a simple economic-choice matrix will not suffice. The dynamic ecosystems within which humans have evolved must remain healthy to ensure human survival, but the abiotic systems essential to human life, health, & culture must also be considered. 2 Figures, 29 References. ¶ Conflicts over the control of environmental risks are explored through the lens of the "disputing" paradigm that has been used increasingly by social scientists to study law. How this perspective can contribute to improved understanding of the complex life cycle of environmental policy disputes is explained, but it is contended that a broader concept of dispute processing is needed due to the fluid character & diverse forms of such disputes. The way in which disputes over the control of environmental risks arise, their content, & the processes by which they are managed are considered. It is suggested that, although most policy disputes are inspired by differences in values, social norms discourage explicit resolution of value conflicts. Explored in conclusion are recent trends in environmental regulation & the ability of individuals to influence control of environmental risks. 72 References. S. ¶ Over time, generalizations about direct causal relationships have been confounded by the complex links among population growth, resource use, & environmental quality. However, the number of poor people in developing countries has been stimulated by rapid population growth, contributing to the degradation of the environment & the renewable resources of land, water, & nonhuman species on which humans depend. While the rich industrial countries have generated environmental pressures & consumed a disproportionate share of nonrenewable resources, population & economic growth have also promoted technological & management changes that help supply & use resources more effectively. Interrelationships of population, resources, & the environment are generally mediated by government policies, & responsible governments can effect a sustainable balance among these three factors by adopting policies that reduce future population growth in developing countries. 23 References. ¶ Whether "ecophilosophers" & conservationists should focus their attention on particular species, or on the communities of which the creatures are a part, is of issue. US individualism, exemplified by the Endangered Species Act, is contrasted with Norwegian environmental protection, exemplified by the Samla Plan for water resource management, which emphasizes "community integrity" as a dynamic, inclusive social ecosystem. Christopher Stone's recent works–Should Trees Have Standing? (Los Altos, Calif: William Kaufmann, Inc, 1974) & Earth and Other Ethics (New York: Harper & Row, 1988)–shed additional light on these different approaches to ecophilosophy. Despite differences in philosophy, it is suggested that any serious commitment to environmental preservation is a step in the right direction. 10 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Against the background of political discussions surrounding the June 1992 Earth Summit in Rio de Janeiro, Brazil, outlined is a possible scenario for a more democratic & environmentally concerned society in the year 2000. Obstacles on the way to the "brave new world" are discussed, along with ways that barriers to the democratization & humanization of society & environmental responsibility can be overcome. Projections regarding the society of the Third millenium are offered, focusing on the role of work & of social sciences. It is concluded that: (1) a certain level of technical, economic, cultural, & societal development is a precondition for more democracy &, with it, environmental protection; (2) decentralization of decision making is a precondition for effective democratization; (3) the greatest possible public participation is necessary for furthering the democratic character of the society; & (4) a socially & environmentally oriented technology must be developed as a material base to cope with social & environmental problems. A self-managed environmental society is one option for the future, but is not guaranteed, & may take a long time to achieve. 39 References. ¶ A systematic approach to examining the way people interpret & cope with risk is described, based on events surrounding a tire fire in Hagersville, Ontario. This "event-driven" study relied on open-ended interviews (N = 11) to assess the community's health concerns about air, water, & soil contamination resulting from the fire. The residents were forced to make lifestyle decisions based on perceptions of risk that were influenced by shared sociocultural conditions. Findings reflect a gradient of concern about contamination from great to mere annoyance. Although the notion of dread risk was lacking, that of unknown risk was important. Mistrust of government was also present, while fear in relation to way of life was evidenced by the concerns over water quality & property values. Also discussed is how the community mediated & ameliorated risk. The steps taken in the construction of a research design that can generate reliable & valid qualitative results are documented. 1 Table, 31 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Theoretically, population-based nutrition surveys of 30 clusters of 30 children should provide reasonably valid estimates of the prevalence of malnutrition with at least 95% confidence. In famine areas of Africa, where an urgent need often exists for rapid nutritional assessment to determine the extent & severity of the problem, visiting 30 sites is often logistically difficult. To determine the effects of using fewer than 30 clusters on the validity & precision of the estimated level of undernutrition, data are analyzed from the 1983 Swaziland National Nutrition Survey & 1984/85 rapid nutrition surveys in Burkina Faso, Guinea, & Niger. It is concluded that fewer than 30 clusters may result in point prevalence estimates that differ dramatically from the true prevalence &, in most instances, are less precise. In contrast, little is gained by collecting more than 30 clusters. Thus, every effort should be made to obtain the logistic support required to study exactly 30 clusters. 3 Figures, 9 References. ¶ Interview data from 65 executive tourism firms in Fla, Tex, & Tenn are drawn on to explore conclusions from the public warning-response literature regarding disaster evacuation planning, initial warning responses, & disaster evacuation behavior. Disaster evacuation planning was reported by nearly all of the executives, although it was highly variable in content, completeness, & formality. Managerial responses to postdisaster warnings paralleled the type of complex social processes documented in the literature, except that warning sources & confirmation behavior were significantly affected by contact with authorities. Five key areas of difference were discovered in disaster evacuation behavior pertaining to: influence of planning, firm vs family priorities, shelter selection, looting concerns, & media contacts. 52 References. Dudley, Eric (Martin Centre Architectural & Urban Studies U Cambridge, CB2 2EB England), Say No to Casual Architecture, Disasters, 1992, 16, 2, June, 169-174.

¶ The contribution of architecture to the inhibition of war is examined. Historically, architecture has served the wealthy or affluent in building symbols of prestige, privilege, & status, making this group masters of the art of conspicuous consumption. It is argued here that building is a political & philosophical statement, & unnecessary consumption of energy or use of materials contributes to injustice & world instability. In this way, architecture has helped to emphasize & deepen the differences that split society. Architecture needs to develop a new rationalism founded in belief in the unity of humankind. Architects must apply the principle of minimum hypocrisy by helping the poor achieve modernity & the rich redefine it. D. ¶ Natural & technologically induced disasters are of prime interest to economists, representing international economic losses of hundreds of billions of dollars annually. From 1948 to 1990, there were 200,000+ earthquake victims in the USSR with economic losses totaling 20 billion rubles. Even in a rich nation such as the US, the economic toll from natural disasters amounts to 1%-2% of the gross national product (GNP), while another 3%-5% should be added to account for the productivity lost from untimely deaths. Direct losses resulting from technological accidents & chronic diseases due to environmental pollution expend 4%-6% of the GNP & are related to 15%-25% of early deaths. In this light, the following topics are discussed with respect to economic prognosis: catastrophes & emergencies, the system of indices for the national & regional security, main principles & mechanisms for regulation, & emergency scenarios. Discussed are problems of access to protection by people in conflict areas, & of caring for displaced people. Among the solutions suggested are the establishment of a UN unit for emergency operations to coordinate relief, full funding of UN humanitarian agencies by the international community, & establishment of humanitarian assistance & protection as a fundamental human right. ¶ A summary of a larger study of public policy on drought in India questions the widespread assumption that drought is a natural calamity, making a case for an ecological view of drought, its causes, & consequences. It is argued that the relief efforts of the government of India have been influenced by a short-term policy perspective, which sees drought as a visitation of nature, requiring immediate fire-fighting strategies of crisis management. It is however, imperative for planners to devise policies that: are preventive rather than combative, can mitigate the social & economic consequences of drought, & contribute to drought-proofing in the long term. Tracing the evolution of famine relief policy since colonial times & reviewing the relief policy of the government of independent India, it is shown that the Drought Prone Areas Program & the Desert Development Program, initiated in the 1970s, have failed to make an impact because investment in such programs has been low. The role of politics in the formulation of public policy is also discussed. 1 Table, 8 References. Modified AA

¶ The evaluation of risk, from both an individual & a societal perspective, is explored in terms of possible loss of life due to exposure to two different types of events over time: (1) from a catastrophic event (a sudden death of many people in a disaster at a yet unknown point in time) expected to occur during a planning period; or (2) from another event (eg, disease, road accident) that claims fewer lives each year, but for which the expected total number of deaths over the planning period is equal to the expected number of deaths from the catastrophic event. Analysis considers the extreme case in which these two events have the same probabilities of death every year & the same expected number of fatalities over the planning period. A model is developed that suggests that the choice between these types of events depends on the value of the following variables: the probability of death over the planning period, the length of the planning period, the individual's time preference pattern, & the utility of being in different anxiety states. Stochastic extensions that may direct the public decision making process are discussed, as are issues of implementation. 39 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ The pros & cons of nongovernment organizations (NGOs) using foreign military resources for disaster relief are examined. Foreign military involvement in disaster relief may range from providing assitance with simple tasks such as transportation to cross border operations to establishment of formal partnerships. Tasks the military may be used for include logistics, engineering & building, medical care, & communications & information gathering. Key issues for NGOs using the foreign military include: (1) initiation & monitoring of military involvement; (2) direction of the military in relief operations; (3) payment of military for services; & (4) assessment of potential harmful effects of use of the military. Arguments for the use of military resource centers on the scarcity of adequate resources in times of great need, while arguments against their use focus on the military's emphasis on government foreign policy objectives over humanitarian needs. 6 References. ¶ In the last several decades, the relationship among society, humanity, technology, & the environment acquired an increasingly dramatic character, due to the intensifying influence of technology on natural processes. Indeed, this technological activity is now viewed by many as a new geological force because of its large impact on the earth; eg, if volcanoes regularly spew 3 billion tons of debris on the earth's surface, 5-7 million tons of waste are generated by mining operations. Industrial civilization, destroying nature's self-regulatory systems, now stands along with natural disasters in posing threats to human security. Analysis reveals that the reasons for most catastrophes are not so much organizational or technological mistakes, but rather, the unforeseen interaction of a large number of factors. A variety of principles useful in reducing the frequency of catastrophes are presented for organizational managers & engineers. M. Meeks

After initial considerations on the spatial & ecological differences between city & country, attention is focused on interdependence between these two sectors of society. Analysis reveals that aggregate pollution is much greater in the cities; however, the lower productivity due to technological backwardness in undeveloped villages points toward a greater pollution of the work environment in rural areas. Urban residents are more aware of living in a polluted environment than are rural residents. 1 Table, 11 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A study of poverty levels in rural & urban areas in Bangladesh using an estimation methodology developed by J. Foster, J. Greer, & E. Thorbecke ("A Class of Decomposable Poverty Measures," Econometrica, 1984, 52, 3). The most powerful effect of poverty, ie, shortfall in food for daily calorie intake, is examined for 1982 & 1986 using data from the Bangladesh Bureau of Statistics' Household Expenditure Surveys. The results show a significant improvement in poverty situations in rural areas between 1982 & 1986. Policy implications are discussed. 7 Tables, 26 References. Adapted from the source document. Daly, Mary (European University Instit, I-50100 Firenze Ferrovia Italy), Europe's Poor Women? Gender in Research on Poverty, European Sociological Review, 1992, 8, 1, May, 1-12.

¶ Existing research on poverty is reviewed for its capacity to reveal the true picture of female poverty in contemporary European society, exploring: the most recent evidence about the extent of poverty, specific but selective evidence of gender differences in poverty in Europe & elsewhere, general poverty research, key shortcomings of research in the area, & implications for poverty research in the future. Empirical findings reveal that women have been largely ignored & that the research methodology customarily employed (eg, the appropriate unit or level of measurement & the equivalence scale used) is incapable of fully accounting for the position of women. It is argued that the use of income as a measure of poverty must be more critically analyzed, & its limitations more openly explored. In addition, the consumption process within the household should be analyzed, rather than taken for granted as it is in most present research. 3 Tables, 43 References. Dean, Mitchell (School Behavioural Sciences Macquarie U, New South Wales 2109 Australia), A Genealogy of the Government of Poverty, Economy and Society, 1992, 21, 3, Aug, 215-251.

¶ The genealogy of a "liberal mode of government" of poverty in the early nineteenth century is followed through a series of related transformations of the older systems of the relief & administration of the poor. The conditions of these older systems are discussed, as are transformations in the language & practice of government in matters of population, economy, & policing. It is contended that the problems of poverty must by understood in relation to issues of morality & economy, but that their constituent domain is one of governance. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Young children raised in poverty are vulnerable to adverse developmental & behavioral outcomes, including gang violence, unemployment, drug use, adolescent pregnancy, & dropping out of high school. The relationship between poverty & child outcomes is explored by examining the effects of lead poisoning, stress, maternal depression, & maternal drug use on child development. Recommendations are made for policy & intervention strategies to ameliorate the long-term effects of these problems. 27 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ An effective antipoverty program should remove a large fraction of the country's poor families from poverty, maintain work incentives, & contain cost. While these goals often are conflicting, a solution to the dilemma may lie in the introduction of European-style family or child allowance programs that pay income supplements to families with children. Here, three potential child allowance programs are discussed: a fixed-dollar tax credit, a tax credit that declines with income, & a taxable allowance of the same dollar amount for each child. It is argued that no specific policy should be expected to completely solve the US poverty problem. Besides economic growth, job training, & raising the minimum wage, alleviation of poverty will require a child support assurance system, under which child support payments are guaranteed by the government & collected from the child's father through withholding taxes. A minimum child support payment for each single mother is also assured by the state. 4 Tables, 38 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ The possibility of reducing rates of school dropout, teenage pregnancy, violent crime, & long-term dependency on welfare–all currently on the political agendas in the US & Canada–are considered. Health, mental health, social service, & educational programs that have proven most successful in these areas provide access to a variety of services, emphasize trust & respect, are community-based, & recognize the needs of those most at risk in designing their programs. To meet the needs of the greater population, however, the systems within which these programs operate must be restructured because the goals & operating procedures of successful programs are fundamentally at odds with how dominant institutions evaluate & fund such efforts. A four-step process toward change is outlined. 10 References. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ A review of the history of social programs in the rural US demonstrates that their success was largely due to the ability of potential beneficiaries to define their problem as societal rather than individual. Accordingly, it is contended that target programs are not doomed, as proponents of the universalistic approach to policy appear to suggest. The political & practical implications of problem definition both for resultant social programs & for the rural poor are discussed. 1 Figure, 43 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ A sample of 314 people attending 11 community board meetings in 4 New York City boroughs responded to questionnaires measuring attitudes toward homeless persons. Direct contact with homeless persons & professional occupation were the most important variables related to favorable attitudes toward homeless persons & the establishment of shelters. Results are compared with those of a previous study of persons employed in New York City (see SOPODA 11:2/89W10588) for whom attitudes were based primarily on information gained from the media. 3 Tables, 16 References. ¶ To explore the social & demographic characteristics of the homeless in Las Vegas, Nev, interview data were obtained from 120 homeless persons & administrators &/or representatives of 22 community organizations. The findings are discussed in the context of 4 available theoretical frameworks explaining homelessness in the US, pertaining to: (1) deinstitutionalization of the mentally ill; (2) shortage of low-cost housing; (3) national economic trends, including rising unemployment; & (4) change in social policies & public values, especially decreased social welfare spending. 22 References. ¶ Through an interpretation of the culture of homelessness in the US, an attempt is made to demonstrate the value of conjunctural interpretive analysis in cultural & media studies. Such an analysis is multilevel (ranging from macrostructures to micropractices), multimodal (encompassing texts, practices, empirical data, mediations, organizations, & policy), & explicitly theoretical & political. Some differences between a critical-structural analysis & analyses produced by other more positivist epistemologies are also outlined. 25 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ Four case studies from long-term field research in upstate NY, complemented by records supplied by agencies & institutions serving the poor, are used to place the problem of rural homelessness in context. Trends in rural housing that reduce the ability of poorer residents to secure adequate shelter are noted, as are strategies poor rural people use to keep themselves from becoming literally homeless. The definition of homelessness should be broadened for rural usage to encompass poor people on the edge of or at high risk of homelessness; also, programs to prevent homelessness must be appropriate for rural situations. 24 References. ¶ Residential preferences were determined via interview & 2 self-report mental health measures for 68 homeless mentally ill persons in 3 Boston, Mass, transitional shelters. An attempt is made to determine how residential preferences are structured & to identify the correlation of preferences with individual characteristics. Findings indicate an expected high level of interest in moving; however, the desire to move can be distinguished from preference for group or for independent living, & preference for group living can be distinguished empirically from clients' belief in their ability to manage without staff. Not all clients prefer completely autonomous living arrangements. The desire to move out of the shelter seemed to reflect a lack of adaptation to homelessness rather than better health or more adequate resources. Those who were more interested in moving were younger & more distressed by their homelessness, had been homeless for a shorter period, & had not been assaulted on the streets. No differences in depression, substance abuse, or social or economic support between those less or more eager to move were found. Implications of the findings for housing programs that seek to match residential opportunities to the preferences of homeless mentally ill persons are discussed. 5 Tables, 1 Figure, 28 References. ¶ Though homelessness is empirically defined as the condition of those people without a permanent place to live, diverse perspectives on homelessness exist that reflect recognition of its dynamics, including intermittent movement in & out of homeless situations & changes in social values over what constitutes adequate housing. Though diverse, the homeless population is predominantly young & single & many suffer from chronic mental illness, alcoholism, physical disabilities, &/or poor health, & have criminal histories. All have experienced long-term unemployment & economic deprivation. Homelessness appears to result from the convergence of many factors, eg, housing market dynamics, housing & welfare policy, economic restructuring & the labor market, & personal disabilities. 3 Tables, 139 References. ¶ Comprehensive interview data from 311 women & 949 men residing in New York City public shelters for homeless adults during summer 1987 were used to develop a classification system based on respondents' history of drug &/or alcohol abuse & mental illness. A typology of 10 groups comprised of individuals with similar profiles on 7 dichotomous measures served as the independent variable. Three pairs of dependent variables were: previous attempts & current thoughts of suicide; a need for medical services; & disclosure of a drug problem & a need for help in treating it. Consistently meaningful associations between group memberships & the 3 pairs of dependent variables, & 16 measures of health status in previous work, attest to the predictive validity of the typology. 4 Tables, 16 References. ¶ A conflict theory perspective of the causes of US urban homelessness points to structural sources of the problem embedded in a capitalist economy. The interaction of a decreasing supply of low-income housing & the marginalization of the poor, victims of shifting governmental policy, family structure transformations, & a changing economy result in urban homelessness. Homelessness myths are debunked, including the causal relationships between the homeless condition & personal disability (alcoholism, chronic physical/mental disorders) & the false importance placed on differences between demographic characteristics of the homeless of the 1930s & the 1980s. 34 References. Yagg, Jon (U Hong Kong, Hong Kong), A Little Local Difficulty: The Management of Difficult-to-Place People in Oxford, International Journal of Law and Psychiatry, 1992, 15, 2, 129-138.

¶ "Difficult-to place" (DTP) is a concept of exclusion, describing almost exclusively homeless persons not covered by social intervention agencies. Based on research in Oxford, England, in 1985/86 on 138 DTPs, motives for an agency's classification as DTP are explored, as are problems involved in developing targeted help strategies. Top on the list of offensive problems shared by the group of DTPs was bizarre/eccentric behavior, & difficulty in maintaining accommodation. Agencies (N = 13) included a night shelter, a hostel, & the psychiatric rehabilitation sector. Each agency was examined to determine why DTPs' needs were not met & how they were shuffled between agencies. Rapidly changing needs of the DTPs coupled with agency inflexibility & lack of interagency coordination were seen as contributing factors. 2 Tables, 10 References. J. Sadler

¶ A discussion of ways that African-American women writers combat the stereotypical belief that their loose sexuality encourages & contributes to men's physical abuse of their bodies through literary representations of the act of rape, examining how a patriarchal society uses rape to force women to conform to its dictates. Poets such as Jayne Cortez, Ntozake Shange, & June Jordan describe rape as a battle that takes place on & over women's bodies. Using an international perspective & demonstrating the commonality of women's struggle, they provide a model for women to identify the war & name the battle. 26 References. ¶ The Taylor-Johnson Temperament Analysis (T-JTA) was used to investigate personality variables characteristic of convicted male batterers. Prior to admission to a court-sponsored treatment program, 75 convicted offenders completed the T-JTA. Results reveal that the T-JTA behavioral disorder types were not useful in identifying distinctions among spouse batterers. However, a 2-factor rotation showed battering men to have a restless proclivity for interaction that is competitive, conflict-oriented, & highly emotional. Further research is suggested to identify attitudes of male batterers & to use the information when evaluating the effectiveness of treatment programs. 3 Tables, 17 References. ¶ The prevalence of risk markers for wife assault among federal offenders is examined through a review of records on 597 inmates, supplemented by interviews & self-report questionnaires administered to 70 inmates & 29 of their female partners. Like other violent offenders, family violence offenders had a prior history of violence; however, compared to other violent inmates, family offenders were more likely to have experienced abuse in their family of origin & to be diagnosed as having a mood/impulse or personality disorder of the borderline, histrionic, or narcissistic variety. ¶ In an examination of gender & ethnic differences in attitudes toward & personal experience of aggression, 415 black & white college students completed anonymous questionnaires. Results showed that males (Ms) were more likely to have received & instigated physical violence & to have suffered physical harm or legal troubles, while females (Fs) were more likely to have experienced sexual violence as well as negative interpersonal effects for behaving aggressively. Few differences were found between black & white respondents. 4 Tables, 39 References. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ Social skills of maritally violent men are examined through questionnaire data, the Conflict Tactics scale, the Short Marital Adjustment test, & problematic marital situation vignettes. Their responses are compared with those offered by nonviolent men. The responses of 56 male Ss living in Indianapolis, Ind, were coded for level of social competency. Responses of men differed in some situations (ie, rejection & challenges from wife, jealousy) but not in others (ie, wife's wanting something from husband, wife teasing husband). Ss were then asked how they would respond to a subset of problematic marital contexts, & again responses were coded for social competency. Violent men offered less competent responses than men in control groups, suggesting they they have greater difficulty generating competent responses. Implications of these findings are discussed. 1 Table, 24 References. Adapted from the source document. (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

Marshall, Linda L. (U North Texas, Denton 76203), Development of the Severity of Violence against Women Scales, Journal of Family Violence, 1992, 7, 2, June, 103-121.

¶ Two versions of the Severity of Violence against Women Scale were developed to measure threatened, attempted, & completed behaviors by males (Ms) against females (Fs). College Fs (N = 707) rated how serious, aggressive, abusive, violent, & threatening it would be if a M carried out 46 acts against a F, while 208 Fs in the Dallas/Fort Worth, Tex, area rated the acts on seriousness, aggressiveness, & abusiveness only. The similar patterns found among both students & community Fs suggest shared perceptions regarding the severity associated with a M doing the acts to a F. It is concluded that use of these sensitive instruments will permit practitioners to discern the more subtle effects of violence against Fs. 3 Tables, 1 Appendix, 18 References. ¶ Traditionally, males (Ms) & younger people have been more involved in violent deaths than other groups. These age-gender discrepancies in participation in violent activity were investigated to explore the hypothesis that men's & women's employment patterns, & by extension, risk-taking behavior & violent death, were converging. The correlation between age & gender & 4 principal causes of violent death–homicide, suicide, automobile accidents, & other accidents–are analyzed with Canadian statistics on mortality 1950-1986. The M-female ratio of mortality due to violence has fluctuated considerably over this period, only dropping slightly for auto accidents, giving little support to convergence theory. Risk of violent death has increased across all age groups during this period; homicides have increased, especially in groups with initially high homicide rates, & suicides have increased, especially for younger Ms ages 20-35. Results point to structural explanations other than risk-taking behavior for the variations in violent death rates by age & gender, eg, exposure to potentially lethal situations & social integration. 2 Tables, 8 Figures, 33 References. ¶ In a comparison of dating violence experienced by high school students from abusive & nonabusive families, 1,353 students in a rural area of ND completed questionnaires on their precourtship dating experiences. Cultural values & attitudes toward violence, circumstances leading to violence between the sexes, attributed reasons for violence, & the acceptance of traditional gender roles were also assessed. Results showed that students from abusive households had a greater incidence of dating violence than those from nonabusive homes, though both groups showed an intolerance for personal violence. However, less than 20% of students from abusive homes reported dating violence, providing little support for the idea of an inescapable pattern of violence among adolescents who have experienced violence themselves. 5 Tables, 20 References. ¶ The frequency with which aggression is inflicted & sustained in heterosexual relationships is assessed. A national survey of 2,105 male (M) & 2,602 female (F) university students reveals that 81% of Ms & 87+% of Fs have inflicted & sustained some form of verbal aggression at least once. It was also found that 37% of Ms & 35% of Fs have inflicted physical aggression in a heterosexual relationship; 39% of Ms & 32% of Fs have sustained it. Frequency does not vary by ethnicity, family income, or institutional characteristics, but regional differences are found in terms of M infliction of physical aggression. ¶ Although most contemporary researchers agree that terrorism is a form of political violence, few have systematically integrated research on terrorism into the broader analysis of political violence. Integration will rescue the subject from its intellectual impoverishment & extend its theoretical scope, precision, & cumulativeness of findings–& thereby promote terrorism research's relevance to a larger community of scholars. In addition, it is suggested that terrorism research might profitably be considered a test of more general theories of societal violence. ¶ The published literature on terrorism & low intensity conflict (LIC) is surveyed to: assess the role that research can play in identifying future adversaries & new challenges; & determine the quality, vision, & policy relevance of research to date. Though the quality has improved in the past fifteen years, the quantity has not kept pace. It is suggested that policy-relevant research on both terrorism & LIC will be more in demand than ever as US security concerns are increasingly affected by a multiplicity of conflicts short of war around the globe. ¶ An empirical examination of people who never transgress legal or moral codes, yet who experience tension resulting from conflict of inner norms & resort to neutralization techniques to prevent cognitive dissonance, based on interview data from 40 German youths born after WWII who had a sense of shared responsibility for the crimes committed under the Nazi regime. The findings show that to overcome the conflict between the humanist values they profess & the memory of the Holocaust, the youths employ the neutralization techniques used by delinquent boys described by Gresham M. Sykes & David Matza (see SA 7:1/595239)–denial of injury, denial of responsibility, denial of the victim, condemnation of the condemner, & appeal to higher loyalities–which are in accord with sociopsychological cognitive consistency theory. The analysis also shows that Sykes's & Matza's theory of neutralization, which can be applied to nondelinquents & to situations not involving guilt, elucidates how people restore cognitive consonance without attitude change. Two universal modes of dilemma resolution–through abstraction & relativization–are briefly discussed. Adapted from the source document. ¶ A biographical sketch of the most important woman in Garveyism–the most powerful black nationalist movement ever established in the US–Amy Jacques Garvey, Marcus Garvey's second wife. Rather than merely depicting her as Marcus's "helpmate," it is contended that Amy Garvey was a key architect of Garveyism & a lifelong advocate of social justice in her own right. ¶ In a review essay, modern implications of two classic texts on feminism & psychoanalysis are assessed: Juliet Mitchell's Psychoanalysis and Feminism (London: Allen Lane, 1974) & Nancy Chodorow's The Reproduction of Mothering (Berkeley: U of California Press, 1978). Complex questions are raised by the issue of feminist psychoanalysis, because while psychoanalysis is based on describing rather than proscribing–the role of the analyst is to understand not to judge–feminist critique is fundamentally proscriptive. Related questions are considered, including the politics of location in psychoanalysis, the relation between psychoanalytic theory & practice, the application of psychoanalysis to literary texts & culture at the expense of political & social analysis, & the modern place of feminism in psychoanalysis. Bell, Vickki (Roehampton Instit, London SW15 5PJ England), Two Modes of Power? Foucault, Feminism and Child Sexual Abuse, Journal of Gender Studies, 1991, 1, 2, Nov, 168-185.
¶ In exploring poststructuralist theories for their potential uses in feminist theory, Michel Foucault's work on the issue of power (Gordon, C. (Ed), Power/Knowledge: Selected Interviews and Other Writings 1972-1977, Brighton: The Harvester Press, 1980) is examined in light of feminist work on child sexual abuse. It is suggested that Foucault's work reads as a vindication of feminist arguments & need not be considered as disruptive & dangerous to feminism. Foucault argues that the application of the Juridico-discursive model of power is no longer appropriate to studying the workings of power today & should be replaced by a new bio-power model that reflects a power over life as opposed to that of the sovereign's power to take or grant life. While Foucault claims that analyses of power should change focus to consider the question of how power operates rather than who has power, the notion of the sovereign as the one who exercises power over the subject, in the case of child sexual abuse, does capture the how of power. In feminist analyses of child sexual abuse, there are in fact both models of power as outlined by Foucault. It is concluded that Foucault's writings on power highlight the coexistence of the two models & suggest that possible interactions between the two should be investigated. 17 References. S. ¶ Humanist discourses tend to equate agency with being fully human. Poststructuralist theory, in contrast, in making visible the way that persons are subjected by discourse, reveals how agency is fundamentally illusory. However, feminist poststructuralist theory opens up another possibility–the speaking/writing subject, who can use some of the understandings of poststructuralist theory itself to regain another kind of agency. The female speaking/writing subject can move within & between discourses, see precisely how they subject her, & use the terms of one discourse to counteract, modify, refuse, or go beyond the other, both in terms of her own experienced subjectivity & in the way she chooses to speak in relation to the subjectivities of others. 1 Table, 22 References. ¶ A review article on books by: Barbara Ehrenreich, Elizabeth Hess, & Gloria Jacobs, Remaking Love: The Feminization of Sex (Garden City: Anchor Press, 1986); & Sylvia Hewlett, A Lesser Life: The Myth of Women's Liberation (New York: Warner Books, 1986 [see listings in IRPS No. 66]). It is contended that Ehrenreich et al inadequately appraise the sexual revolution's impact on women by paradoxically appropriating a feminist version of the revolution for women, while allowing that behaviors & attitudes have changed little for men. In addition, although the authors claim that the feminization of sex began in the 1960s with Beatlemania, they fail to consider Beatlemania's dubious commercializing influence on sex & femininity. Hewlett, on the other hand, tellingly demonstrates the persistence of structural conditions that curb upward mobility for women. Finding that 90% of US women have not made significant economic gains in the last 20 years, Hewlett shows that economic strains are particularly great for single & divorced women with children who must support a family & provide for daytime child care. It is thus demonstrated that neither the sexual revolution nor the feminist movement has helped women to achieve economic parity with men. M. ¶ A close reading of 150 advertisements in the Sept 1987 issue of Mademoiselle reveals that feminist discourses get reframed in the mass media according to the logic of commodity relations. Rather than fight the legitimacy of feminist discourse, advertisers appropriate key aspects of the discourse as semiotic markers & strategically attach them to specific brand names to increase their market share. Although it might seem that a new era of democratic pluralism will result, it is found that the many faces of feminism appearing in women's magazines are but a single aspect of an internally contradictory hegemonic process–the ongoing dialectic between dominant & oppositional discourse. 26 References. Haj, Samira (Kevorkian Center New York U, NY 10003), Palestinian Women and Patriarchal Relations, UM Signs, 1992, 17, 4, summer, 761-778.

¶ The problematic in Western feminist theory in relating to non-Western feminist nationalist struggles is considered. Taking the Palestinian case, patriarchal relations as reproduced & contested in the occupied territories of the West Bank & Gaza Strip of Israel are analyzed. Contrary to developmentalist views that equate a market economy with social & economic progress, in the case of Palestinian rural women, proletarianization under Israeli colonization policies guaranteed neither economic freedom nor the breakdown of patriarchal relations. The introduction of the market, rather than liberating women, helped to reinforce & reproduce patriarchal relations. Contestation of patriarchal relations, on the other hand, emerged with the rise of a grass-roots national movement (the Intifada), whereby women, through their activism, began to develop feminist consciousness & challenge traditional patriarchal structures within the family & society. Feminist consciousness, however, is largely limited to the younger generation of women (& men) who had little to gain from traditional patriarchal relations, unlike the older generation of women who earned relative power within the patriarchal structures through seniority & bearing sons, & therefore have an investment in protecting these relations. Hammersley, Martyn (School Education Open U, Milton Keynes MK7 6AA England), On Feminist Methodology, Sociology, 1992, 26, 2, May, 187-206.
Comments, 207-218.

¶ Arguments in support of the claim that there is a distinctively feminist methdology are assessed by summarizing key feature of such a methodology in terms of four themes: the ubiquitous significance of gender & gender asymmetry, the validity of experience as against method, rejection of hierarchy in the research relationship, & emancipation as the goal of research & the criterion of validity. It is contended that the arguments in support of a feminist methodology do not establish it as a coherent & cogent alternative to nonfeminist research. Many of the ideas on which feminist methodologists draw are found in the nonfeminist literature, many of which are unconvincing. The idea of a specifically feminist methodology exemplifies the attempt to establish a separate methodological paradigm based on distinctive political & philosophical assumptions that are held to motivate a unique form of research practice. In On Feminist Methodology: Male Reason versus Female Empowerment, Caroline Ramazanoglu (Goldsmith's Coll, London SE14 GNW England) suggests that feminism fails Hammersley's test of validity because this test is based on his uncritical privileging of reason in some sort of established scientific community. His assumptions about what constitutes convincing knowledge are rooted in a conceptual split between the goals of science & rationality, & those of politics & personal commitment. Feminist methodologies expose unreasonable assumptions about the superiority & neutrality of reason, while Hammersley's position disempowers women & should be resisted. In Response to Martyn Hammersley's Paper On Feminist Methodology, Loraine Gelsthorpe (Instit of Criminology, U of Cambridge, CB3 9DT England) argues that while feminists have been struggling with issues of power & control in the research process, which many other view as unproblematic, there is no single feminist line on this issue. By concluding that the case for a feminist methodology is not convincing, Hammersley fails to acknowledge that, though feminists have expressed methodological preferences, there has been no consensus. 65 References. ¶ Arguing that cultural differences can neither be investigated nor integrated in feminist psychological research without methodological change, a feminist challenge to traditional empiricist methods is outlined. To demonstrate the importance of the issue of cultural interpretation & meaning & the benefits of the integrative methodology, a simple experiment was conducted with an ethnically diverse sample of 138 undergraduate women ages 17-57, exploring the assumption that the words & phrases in feminist psychological instruments do not carry the same meaning across cultures. The hypothesized differences in interpretation of simple experimental stimuli were supported, as was the hypothesis that these interpretations would be related to (self-rated) behavior. White women did not differ from women of color in self-ratings on several gender-role stereotypic terms (etic data), but the two groups differed significantly in how they defined & interpreted those terms while rating themselves (emic data). Suggestions are offered for: the treatment of research participants, interpretation of data from ethnically homogeneous samples & an etic/emic integrative methodology. 3 Tables, 28 References. ¶ The relationship between knowledge, feminism, & universality is explored, beginning with the observation that some forms of knowledge are able to assume a universal form whether or not they represent all of humanity. This ability is a feature of, eg, both patriarchal & ethnocentric discourse, & is also evident in certain forms of feminist thought. Totalizing forms of feminism attempt to incorporate differences within a unitary body of thought. Differences (between women) are recognized if they do not disrupt the articulation of a general position. Once this form of universal perspective is coupled with a dominant source of feminist thought (white, Western), the ability to represent all women ensues, whether or not such a representation is warranted. Though it is important to be able to theorize beyond the absolutely specific instance, universal theorizing has come to be associated with the ability of some (dominant) interests to use & impose universal thought as a guise for their own particularity. Strategies for negotiating this tension are discussed, developing an alternative epistemology & outlining a feminist politics of adaptation. 34 References. Modified AA

¶ The methods that feminists used in the 1920s to synthesize equality & difference are reconstructed because they are crucial for understanding the basis for women's citizenship & the essence of public policies in a feminist welfare state. This serves three goals: to salvage the 1920s feminist model from historical interpretations that reduce it to polemics; to redefine academic discourses on gender & the origins of US welfare capital that have unjustly been identified as purely patriarchal; & to explore the alternative notion of citizenship that 1920s feminists successfully proposed. Reexamination of these goals casts new light on feminists' ability to challenge gender inequality while retaining notions of gender difference. ¶ Reflections are offered on the failure of the lesbian-feminist movement (LFM) of the 1970s, focusing on why it became fragmented & centerless. The history of lesbian-feminism is reviewed & read as a series of partial & strategic identity reconstructions. It is argued that LFM was fragmented by two conflicting projects: to fix lesbians as a stable minority group, & to liberate the lesbian in every woman. These two projects were held together by feminist ideology, which sought to redefine lesbianism in more universal terms & to create a lesbian culture founded on resistance to gender & sexual norms. Today's decentered LFM marks a turning away from the previous generation's preoccupation with lesbian identity & a turning toward more global issues & concerns, which bodes well for democracy. 9 Illustrations. ¶ Countermovements, such as the women's movement opposing feminist goals & social change, are not novel in US & Canadian history. The US women suffrage movement became a social movement after the Civil war, but it was not until 1912 that a formidable countermovement had developed, espoused by women who preferred traditional patterns of behavior & resisted social change. This countermovement was less developed in Canada, perhaps because the suffragists had learned from their US counterparts not to attack the antisuffragist values. In the early 1970s, the speedy ratification in the US of the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) seemed assured until a countermovement developed in late 1972, which successfully defeated the ERA. This well-placed opposition focused on preserving the traditional industrial family & positioned the women's movement as the cause of family breakdown. The profamily movement in Canada developed with a similar ideological makeup & roots in organized religion & antiabortion feeling. As the conflict between feminists & antifeminists is prolonged, a pattern of interdependence has evolved, & programs, strategies, & ideologies are continually adjusted to match the other group. 25 References. Tuohimaa, Sinikka (Dept Literature U Oulu, SF-90101 Finland), Feminine Language–Contradictory Textual Politics, Semiotica, 1991, 87, 3-4, 371-379.

¶ According to French poststructural theory, femininity is something that is suppressed & marginal in language systems & cultures. After outlining some general principles of this theory, characteristics of feminine language are discussed. Possible modes of approaching femininity in poetic language are examined, according to this theory, through a reading of a prose poem by the Finnish poetess Tyyne Saastamoinen. Feminine textual politics are manifested in contradictory elements at the levels of discourse & theme. There is a conflict between masculine & feminine values, found also in the description of environment, characters, & style. The bodily quality of feminine language is clearly seen in rhythm, but at the semantic level, the most interesting aspect of the text is metaphor. Metaphor represents hidden things in a text; as Sigmund Freud has shown, symbols are comparable with dreams, which come from the unconscious. In much the same way as dreams, symbols express individual feelings, hidden emotions. To go beyond the socially determined mode of thought & language, one must investigate the nature of the symbol. As an example of this quality of metaphor, Saastamoinen's prose poem is examined. The experience of dissolution is described through very concrete metaphors: "as if a beehive were ascending & as if ants were at war." The state of the human mind is described by concrete natural images; a bridge has been built between mind & nature. 1 Figure, 12 References. AA

¶ A review symposium on a book by Patricia Hill Collins, Black Feminist Thought: Knowledge, Consciousness, and the Politics of Empowerment (Boston: Unwin Hyman, 1990 (see listing in IRPS No 66)). Robert G. Newby (Central Michigan U, Mount Pleasant) argues that Collins provides a synthesis of an important body of knowledge, offering an analysis of the ideas of black women, particularly those reflecting a consciousness in opposition to oppression. She also seeks to discern the relationship of black feminist thought to knowledge, consciousness, & the politics of empowerment. Collins argues that to understand the basis of the oppressions of black women would require a consciousness that includes an awareness of the group to which one belongs, a feeling of commonality with the group, a recognition of the subordination of that group, a recognition of the basis & illegitimacy of that subordination, & acting on behalf of the group to eliminate that subordination. However, Collins does not make clear what the formation or target of this collective action would be, & her vision does not clearly take into account the obstacles that are to be overcome. Deborah K. King (Dartmouth Coll, Hanover, NH) praises the book for its explication of black women's standpoint & black feminist thought, & for its synthesis of earlier examinations of black women's perspectives. A major contribution of this work is its critical commingling & elaboration of feminist & Afrocentric perspectives. The work, however, provides very few references to sociological analyses. Barrie Thorne (U of Southern California, Los Angeles) suggests that the work makes a valuable contribution to the sociology of knowledge by linking the social positions & historical experiences of African-American women to their forms of consciousness & understanding. While the strengths of an argument that sets forth the outlook of a structurally distinct group of knowers are recognized, weaknesses are noted in the absence of reference to structural (social class) lines that divide African-American women & affect their experiences. In Reply, Collins states that she deliberately minimized the obvious heterogeneity among African-American women created by differences in experience to attend to the political context, & to delineate the contours of black feminist thought in a way that would be taken seriously as an area of intellectual inquiry. 8 References. ¶ Ways that global capitalist economic restructuring is affecting the working lives of US women are explored, focusing on the growth of women's employment opportunities & the quality of their jobs as a consequence of the restructuring of employment, increasing flexibility of work, changing skill demand, & attempts to reduce hierarchy & increase workers' participation. Though the outlook for the 1990s remains negative for many women, it is positive for a few if trends continue in their present direction. 39 References. Adapted from the source document.

Ahola, Anja, Psyykkisen oireilun sukupuolieroista (Gender Differences in Revealing Psychological Symptoms), 1992, 29, 1, 23-34. (FIN)

¶ Differences in the way males (Ms) & females (Fs) report psychological symptoms are examined, based on interviews conducted in Finland as part of the 1986 Survey on Living Conditions (N = 4,934 Ms & 5,299 Fs, ages 15-64). Several aspects of psychological symptom reporting are investigated: (1) gender & socioeconomic group differences, (2) gender differences within different socioeconomic groups, & (3) differences in how Ms & Fs experience & reveal stress. Analysis reveals that educated people tend to report more psychological symptoms than less-educated people, & Fs more than Ms. Gender was found to be a more salient factor than socioeconomic group. The data were interpreted based on stress theory M/F differences in socialization are noted as a possible explanation for differences in revealing psychological symptoms. 3 Tables, 2 Figures, 54 References. A Cross-Cultural Review of the Socioecology of Ideals of Female Body Shape, Ethology and Sociobiology, 1992, 13, 3, May, 197-227.

¶ Data from the Standard Cross-Cultural Sample (Murdock, G. P., & White, D. R., "The Standard Cross-Cultural Sample and Its Codes," in Barry, H., & Schlegel, A. (Eds), Cross-Cultural Samples and Codes, Pittsburgh: U of Pittsburgh Press, 1980, 3-44) are drawn on to test predictions derived from several socioecological hypotheses related to three biological functions of human female (F) body fat (insulation, storage of calories, & regulation of fertility) to explore cross-cultural variations in preferences for fat vs thin F body types. Results suggest that attitudes toward F fatness are related to (1) reliability of food supply, (2) climate, (3) relative social dominance of Fs, (4) value placed on F work, & (5) probability that the expression of F adolescent sexuality will have adverse consequences. 5 Tables, 1 Figure, 1 Appendix, 73 References. ¶ Denying certain groups of people physical mobility during the thirty-year colonial regime (1890-1939) in Zimbabwe (southern Rhodesia) was a crucial issue in the relationship between colonial rulers & the ruled. In fact, restricting the mobility of women, which became the key to their independence, had become an unworkable policy by the mid-1930s. Discussed is how mobile African women provided domestic labor–cooking, cleaning, childrearing, supplementing male incomes, & sexual services–as they moved across the barriers of the supposedly all white towns of southern Rhodesia. Study of the issue of mobility reveals the gendered nature of colonial economic policies & of political relations inside African households. L. Dorn

¶ Most modern scholars agree that the Shakers, from their founding in eighteenth-century England, practiced gender equality. This celibate, communal sect, which included women in both temporal & spiritual leadership, has been hailed as progressive, even feminist. The history of the Shakers is traced from 1770, & the lives of several spiritual leaders are detailed, revealing that the feminization of Shaker leadership did not begin until the late nineteenth century, & then only because of a worsening gender balance. It is contended that the Shakers were never committed to the complete equality of the sexes. L. Dorn

Bunch, Charlotte (Douglass Coll Rutgers U, New Brunswick NJ 08903), Recognizing Women's Rights as Human Rights, Response to the Victimization of Women and Children, 1990, 13, 4, winter, 13-16.

¶ The gap in the application of human rights principles to women's rights & different approaches to closing it are examined. Although records of physical abuse & death clearly demonstrate the serious nature & extent of the problem, women's rights are neither fully understood nor classified as human rights. Much of women's abuse is part of a larger socioeconomic problem that makes women vulnerable to abuses than cannot be delineated as exclusively political or solely caused by states. It is suggested that feminists must supplement the traditional approaches that have been taken to human rights by making women more visible within them, thus transforming the concept & practice of human rights. Four somewhat overlapping approaches to effectively link women's rights to human rights in terms of addressing violence against women are discussed: representing women's political & civil rights, representing socioeconomic rights of women, creating legislation & legal mechanisms to counter sex discrimination, & transforming the concept of human rights to take more account of women's lives. 14 References. ¶ In an exploration of whether explicit social comparison information (CI) & performance feedback (PF) influence women's & men's perceptions of personal entitlement for pay, questionnaire data were obtained from 99 female (F) & 104 male (M) students at the State U of New York, Buffalo, after they had read 1 of 9 versions of a scenario depicting an undergraduate research assistant. Findings show that in the absence of both CI & PF, Fs felt they deserved less pay than did Ms. However, these gender differences were eliminated when Fs & Ms were exposed to either the same CI or the same PF. Path analyses further revealed that the effects of CI & PF on judgments of pay fairness & satisfaction were mediated almost exclusively by feelings of entitlement. 1 Figure, 15 References. ¶ Observational & translated interview data obtained from 5 Burmese acaults (males who engage in cross-gender behavior) indicate that Western concepts of transsexualism, gynemimesis, transvestism, & homosexuality are not distinct categories in Myanmar (formerly Burma). Although Myanmar is a profoundly Buddhist society, the people still have strong animistic beliefs within an elaborate system of nats (spirit gods). They believe that a female nat named Manguedon may take possession of males & impart femininity on them. The cross-gender status of the acaults is sanctioned by their spiritual marriage to Manguedon. The acaults, while not envied, are respected for their roles as shamans & seers. 5 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Guided by a phenomenological perspective, interviews were conducted to explore the meaning of singleness to 9 never-married, heterosexual, childless women ages 32-54 from a southern metropolitan area. The data yielded 13 categories that reflected key meanings of singleness, demonstrating its multifaceted nature not only for different women, but also for individual women at different points in time. Implications of these findings for sensitizing nurses to the subjective world of never-married women are discussed. 2 Appendixes, 22 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An analysis is presented of Luisa Muraro's Guglielma e Maifreda ([Guglielma and Maifreda] Milan: La Tartaruga, 1985) & other works. A negative assessment is presented of her fictional story of the Holy Spirit being made incarnate in the person of the heroine Guglielma, sent to liberate the Jews & Muslims. The maternal language used is at times hard to understand. The symbolism employed in her novels is of an entirely different level than found in conventional novels. Some resemblances can be seen with the magical realist school of modern Latin American literature. M. Meeks

¶ Given that boys & girls differ in their behavioral & emotional responses to stressful family events, data from the National Longitudinal Survey of Youth (N = 68) are used to assess whether & how (1) marital discord, (2) marital stability & change, (3) harsh discipline, & (4) maternal deviance impact delinquency, alcohol use, & depression in males (Ms) & females (Fs). Multivariate analyses reveal that, although Fs generally display more vulnerabilities to specific dimensions of family life than Ms, the responses to these risk factors are not constrained to gender-stereotypic outcomes. 2 Tables, 1 Figure, 76 References. Duggan, Lisa, Making It Perfectly Queer, UM Socialist Review, 1992, 22, 1, Jan-Mar, 11-31.

¶ The terms "queer nation" & "queer theory," now widely used by academics & activists, represent new ways of thinking & acting politically, particularly in their challenge to liberal assimilationist & militant nationalist strands of gay politics. Both of these perspectives are criticized for: basing their politics on the primacy of sexual identity, defined as unitary & residing in the individual; & representing the view of twentieth-century Western, white, gay males, to the exclusion of other voices. From a constructionist perspective, it is maintained that the notion of "queer community" can be fruitfully used to construct a new kind of collectivity that is unifed only by its shared dissent from the dominant organization of sex & gender. A brief history of queer theory is offered, & its current status in academia discussed. W. Howard

Dulac, Germain, De la métamorphose du genre masculin (The Metamorphosis of the Masculine Gender), Recherches Sociographiques, 1991, 32, 3, Sept-Dec, 415-425. (FRE)

¶ The definition of masculine gender in academic & militant discourses has contributed greated to sexual inequality by legitimating the power of males. Based on analyses of such discourses in Quebecois literature, elements of the masculine Quebecois voice are distinguished. The paradigm of masculine gender socially constructed by Quebecois mens' groups & social scientists is changing, however. Militant men have begun to note the similarities between women's & men's social situations. Mens' rights have also made a comeback. These changes are reflected in a greater legitimacy in social relations between the sexes. 30 References. Adapted from the source document as translated by J. Sadler.

¶ Pedestrians in Manhattan & Albany, NY, & students from 2 NY colleges (total N = 442) responded to questionnaires regarding their "private wishes." In general, the preference of females (Fs) & males (Ms) for various wishes were very similar: wishes that showed small to moderate differences between genders included the tendency for Fs to value peace more than Ms & the greater desire of Ms for escaping reality bounds. Fs were much less likely than Ms to choose the wish "to have sex with anyone I choose," a finding that has been demonstrated repeatedly in the literature. It is suggested that this gender difference in sexual desires reflects a complex interplay between biological & social factors. Implications for understanding sexual harassment are discussed. 5 Tables, 1 Figure, 43 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ A discussion of possible applications of the technique of personal storytelling to legal discourse involving gay rights issues. A review of the literature concludes that storytelling is most effectively used by traditionally excluded groups to identify & counter "pre-understanding"–the set of beliefs, good & bad, a listener might have about members of the group. Three common forms of pre-understanding about gay men & lesbians are discussed: (1) gay sexuality is obsessive, all-encompassing, & divorced from love, long-term relationships, & family structures; (2) gay issues are not appropriate for public discussion; & (3) lesbians & gay men exhibit characteristics stereotypically associated with the other gender. Stories that demonstrate the existence of each type of pre-understanding are presented, explaining why each type is incorrect & harmful. Suggestions are offered for the use of storytelling by advocates to counter all three. A legal argument is developed for attacking sexual orientation discrimination as illegal gender discrimination, & its advantages over other arguments currently being employed by gay rights advocates in the courts are identified. ¶ Israeli political discourse regarding the Middle East conflict is dominated by collective emotions of rage & grief. Here, data obtained during fieldwork in 1990 are drawn on to describe how the weekly peace vigils of the Women in Black who protest the state's occupation of the West Bank & Gaza, & the opposition that these vigils encounter, publicly display politicized collective emotions. In these confrontations, grief & rage articulate intense contestations regarding the politics of peace, as well as the politics of gender. Rage & grief unravel two drastically different visions of transcending national vulnerabilities & two disparate constructions of gender identity. 2 Figures, 44 References. ¶ A variety of historical & census data is drawn on to explore the relationship between married women's waged labor & their position in the racial stratification order, comparing Chinese-Canadians in British Columbia with Chinese-Americans in Calif & Hawaii, drawing on a theoretical perspective that sees gender as differentially constructed within ethnic groups & as reflecting the interaction of group heritage, historical experiences, & location in the stratification order. Analysis reveals that Chinese women had initially low rates of participation in the waged labor force, functioning as unpaid labor in family enterprises & entering the waged labor force only after the decline of the era of ethnic enterprise. This may initially have been a response to the limited earning capacity of Chinese males, but women remained there even after husbands' income improved. It would appear that the Chinese community initially possessed a set of norms comparable to the cult of domesticity, but their experiences in North America produced a normative transformation, ie, a shift from the belief that "a married woman's place is in the home" to "a married woman has an obligation to work & help support her family." 4 Tables, 65 References. Giles, Wenona (York U, North York Ontario M3J 1P3), Gender Inequality and Resistance: The Case of Portuguese Women in London, Anthropological Quarterly, 1992, 65, 2, Apr, 67-79.

¶ Interview data collected 1982-1989 from 22 married Portuguese migrant women in London, England, reveal that, while they value the wage derived from their work in the labor force, they do not necessarily find that this satisfactorily alters household gender relations. Because women's day-to-day experiences are multifaceted, expressions of resistance to gender inequalities in the household can best be explored by examining both household & nonhousehold relations, as well as other sociopolitical experiences. These married women express discontent with their lives in London by their orientation toward return to Portugal. However, their involvement in the labor force has resulted in different return orientations among married & single women & men. These differences are explored here by examining the social relations of the wage workplace & the household. 52 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ In an explanation of gender differences in self-reported first sexual fantasies, Ss (N = 127 males (Ms) & 138 females (Fs) from 2 state universities) described 2 of the earliest fantasies they could recall & 2 current fantasies using a questionnaire. Ms reported having their first fantasies at an earlier age, wrote more explicit & shorter fantasies, & rated themselves as having more positive & fewer negative emotional responses to their first sexual fantasies. For Fs, the event leading up to the first fantasy involved a relationship, whereas for Ms, a visual cue was more often reported. First fantasies involved themes such as sex with movie stars or adults the Ss knew, such as teachers. Results are interpreted as reflecting different patterns of sex-role socialization for Ms & Fs. 3 Tables, 14 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Observational data obtained during 15 20-minute blocks of academic instructional time for 9 US & 10 Japanese fifth-grade teachers were used to analyze teachers' individualism vs collectivism & androgenous vs gender-differentiated handling of boys & girls. Japanese teachers attended significantly more often to groups rather than to individual children, even controlling for their tendency to use whole group modes of instruction. Teachers in both countries paid more attention, especially negative attention, to boys. However, observations of the children indicated that this difference could not be attributed to boys' bad behavior. US boys & girls' behaviors did not differ significantly; Japanese boys were significantly more off-task than girls, but the gap was slight in comparison to the gender difference inattention paid by teachers. There were no consistent effects of teachers' gender on either teacher communication or children's behavior. 6 Tables, 2 Figures, 37 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An analysis of gender distinctions in Finnish magazine advertisements is informed by Michel Foucault's theories on morality & techniques of self (Hurley, Robert [Tr], The Use of Pleasure. Volume 2 of The History of Sexuality, New York: Pantheon Books, 1985). Two sets of advertisements found in magazines targeted at women & family readers were sampled from 1955 & 1985. After a general discussion of the cultural basis for gender distinctions, the role of advertising texts on everyday life is explored. Advertisements are read as an explicit means to persuade a product's purchase, implicitly instructing the reader on facets of virtuous self-conduct. Over the thirty-year period, a shift in family & working life virtues, in the value & nature of friendship, & in public conduct & appearance is noted. These true cultural changes are found in the increased importance of women & children, & the domestication of men. 3 Tables, 2 Figures, 9 Photographs, 38 References. J. Sadler major domains–self-determinism & accountability; family; pride; & spirituality & humanism–& 15 distinct clusters of ideas. The cluster of attributes rated as most important to being a man parallels the conceptualization of manhood derived from open-ended interviews for both professional & nonprofessional men. Men's ratings of attributes in the areas of ownership, manliness, spiritual & religious, & power vary by occupational status. 1 Table, 61 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Conceptualization & Q-sort methods are used to examine constructions of manhood & ratings of the importance of selected attributes to being a man among a sample of 32 Afro-American men from central NY. Manhood emerges as a multidimensional construct consisting of 4

¶ Several issues facing US males (Ms) in the 1990s are discussed. Dramatic changes in women's lives over the past 25 years are summarized, focusing on (1) making gender visible as a category of analysis; (2) workplace; (3) the relationship between work & family life; & (4) sexuality. ¶ The possibility that lower levels of aggression in females (Fs) may be explained by gender-role-appropriate attributions is examined, drawing on data obtained via the Personal Attributes Questionnaire (PAQ) from 91 F undergraduates of which 60 high & low masculinity scorers were randomly assigned to 1 of 6 experimental drug treatment conditions in a 2 X 3 factorial design. It was expected that the influence of gender-role masculinity on affect & aggression would be greatest when the nature of the affective arousal was ambiguous. Findings confirm the expectation that, when provoked, high-masculinity Ss are more aggressive than low-masculinity Ss, but only in the ambiguous drug information condition. While the Fs reported more arousal-related sensations, they did not rate themselves higher in anger. It is suggested that insulted women with a more masculine gender-role orientation & having only ambiguous arousal information tend to appraise situations in terms of provocation, possibly because of their gender-role history. The results suggest the critical importance of arousal & understanding of one's arousal in the relationship of gender role & interpersonal aggression in Fs. 2 Tables, 25 References. ¶ A comparison of gender segregation among groups of Bedouin living in Ramla, Israel, vs the Negev Highlands. Both groups leave to the mother the task of inculcating in girls the notions of claustration & propriety &, frequently, of supervising genital mutilation. Reasons why mothers accept this role, thereby perpetuating the gender-related perceptions of shame (femininity) & honor (masculinity), are proposed, focusing on social structure & conventions of group dynamics. The link between shame & gender also supplies the metaphor for the superior status of big agnatic groups over small ones. The perpetuation of women's inferiority is thus located in the code of symobls underlying community politics. 53 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Data obtained via questionnaire & indepth interview from 189 female (F) students at a predominantly white Afrikaans university in 1989 are drawn on to compare the sex-role attitudes of those enrolled in traditionally F vs traditionally male (M) courses. Results confirm the hypothesis that such attitudes are divisible into three dimensions: division of labor, distribution of power, & other stereotypical attitudes. The most distinctive differences between the two groups of students occur with regard to the division of labor: both accept married Fs' pursuit of a career, but traditional Ss do so with many more qualifications. Statistically significant differences are found between the groups regarding the other two dimensions as well, although both support the position of Ms as heads of households & stress merit as the most important criterion for workplace advancement. Suggestions are offered for additional research on sex-role attitudes in the South African context. 4 Tables, 17 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An integrative leadership model–connective leadership (CL)–is developed that combines the traditional masculine US ego-ideal with additional female role behaviors more appropriate for an interdependent world. Based on the L-BL Achieving Styles Model (Lipman-Blumen, Jean, Individual and Organizationaal Achieving Styles: A Conceptual Handbook for Researchers and Human Resource Professionals, 4th edition, Claremont, Calif: Achieving Styles Instit, 1991) CL emphasizes connecting individuals to their own, as well as others', tasks & ego drives. Achieving styles are defined as the characteristic behaviors individuals use to achieve their goals. The model includes three sets of achieving styles (direct, instrumental, & relational), each subsuming three industrial styles, resulting in a full complement of nine distinct achieving styles. Gender differences in achieving styles are reported & related to the CL paradigm. 1 Figure, 43 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Questionnaires composed of several scales were utilized to explore the effects of gender, race, religion, & political orientation on 4 areas of sex-role ideology among 556 freshmen at an Ivy League university: (1) traditional attitudes toward female (F) sexuality, (2) justification of male (M) dominance, (3) attitudes toward feminism, & (4) negative attitudes toward homosexuality. Multivariate analyses supported the hypothesized effects of religion & political orientation on all 4 sex-role areas: liberals vs conservatives & Jews vs Protestants were less traditional in their attitudes toward F sexuality, less accepting of M dominance & negative attitudes toward homosexuality, & more accepting of feminist attitudes. Ms were more supportive of M dominance & less supportive of feminist attitudes than were Fs. Only 2 sex-role attitudes were influenced by race: Asians reported more traditional attitudes toward F sexuality than did blacks & whites, & were more supportive of M dominance than were whites. The noteworthy finding of no significant gender differences in traditional attitudes toward F sexuality is discussed. 2 Tables, 41 References. Adapted from the source document.

Mail & telephone surveys, & suc methods as the randomized response technique, have all been used to tr to overcome this problem, with varying degrees of success. Here, d scribed is an alternative approach that uses a sealed booklet. The analys compares results obtained from a question-format experiment, utilizin a national survey that asked respondents (N = 1,823) the same sensiti questions regarding drug use in a sealed booklet, completed in the pre ence of the interviewer, & in a standard face-to-face interview. T sealed booklet format was found to produce more accurate estimates drug use compared to direct questions. In addition to assuring greater a onymity, the sealed booklet permits a wide range of questions to be asked & does not limit the analyses that can be conducted on the data. 5 Tables, 20 References. Modified AA ¶ Interview data obtained during a 1974 follow-up study of 687 US men who were part of the employed civilian labor force in 1964 (along with 555 of their wives) are drawn on to explore the relationship between job complexity & supervision for male & female workers & the economic & social factors that underlie the configuration of task & authority relations. Results suggest dramatic differences in the rationalization of work arrangements by gender--especially in the extent to which social status influences supervisory practices. Further, there appear to be overtime differences in the labor-market processes structuring progressions of jobs & thus normative work arrangements. Findings challenge common assumptions about bureaucratic authority & highlight the role of supervision in labor segmentation within the workplace. 3 Tables, 2 Figures, 72 References. ¶ Using data from personal interviews conducted in 1982 with 101 senior managers in 2 NY government bureaucracies & survey data for 390 managers in the highest grade levels, the impact of gender on access to & participation in senior managerial networks in the public sector is explored. Two models of workplace rewards are assessed, including a rational-technical theory that provides an explanation for males' (Ms') advantage in top positions & networks, & a contrasting discrimination model in which gender & ethnicity operate to limit access to organizational positions & to maintain advantages of favored groups within organizations. The findings indicate that 90% of high-level managerial positions are occupied by Ms. The rare females (Fs) in high positions do not differ dramatically in formal positions & associated responsibilities from their M counterparts. Some evidence of M advantage is found in their slightly higher civil service ranks, but Ms have job titles similar to Fs & are more likely to occupy line positions or to report budget-making responsibility. Some gender differences in friendship networks are found, & it is suggested that Ms' relative isolation from F peers may have consequences in their perceptions of & behavior toward senior F managers. The findings partially support both rational-technical & discrimination theories of workplace rewards. 4 Tables, 38 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ An analysis of the ways that males (Ms) & females (Fs) are affected by a rival's attractiveness & by the commitment to an alternative relationship in jealousy-provoking situations. Ss in Tel Aviv, Israel, who were all married 5-10 years, read experimental vignettes & rated the protagonist's likely responses; data on several personal variables (eg, dispositional jealousy, self-esteem, & quality of marital relationship) were also collected, via questionnaire. Results indicate that responses to the vignettes were mediated by an interaction between the rival attractiveness, the degree of commitment to alternative relationships, & S's gender. M responses appeared to be driven by their concern with protecting their egos; Fs, on the other hand, seemed most concerned with protecting their relationships. 4 Tables, 21 References. ¶ The method developed by J. E. Williams & D. L. Best (Measuring Sex-Stereotypes. A Thirty-Nation Study, Beverly Hills, Calif: Sage, 1982) to study the development of sex-stereotype knowledge (SSK) among young children in 24 countries was extended to examine a sample of 444 Portuguese children, ages 5, 8, & 11, evenly divided by age, gender, & socioeconomic status (SES). Ss were asked to select between male (M) & female (F) silhouettes as the person described in brief stories containing highly sex-typed psychological characteristics (aggressive, emotional, etc). Results indicate a regular increase in SSK across the age range studied, increased SSK with increasing SES, a greater knowlege of F than of M stereotype traits, & more dramatic effects of age & SES for M than for F stereotype items. Results are compared with previous findings in Brazil & other Latin American countries, & with those of Williams & Best. 4 Tables, 9 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Two studies were conducted to determine the influence of a female/male (F/M) political candidate's private life on voter perception & choices. The impact of a familial situation on attitudes toward a hypothetical presidential candidate was investigated in Study 1. Although main effects for candidate sex & familial situation were found, questionnaire data from 155 Tex university students did not support differential effects by candidate sex. In Study 2 the potential impact of a candidate's personal problem was examined via questionnaire among 172 students. Findings show that a M with past psychological problems was perceived as more electable than 3 of 4 F candidates. In both studies, M candidates were perceived as more likely than F candidates to win the election. 3 Tables, 7 References. Adapted from the source document.

¶ Psychologists Daniel Linz, Edward Donnerstein, & S. Penrod ("The Findings and Recommendations of the Attorney General's Commission on Pornography. Do the Psychological Facts Fit the Political Fury?" American Psychologist, 1987, 42, 946-953), as well as others, contend that the 1986 Meese Commission on Pornography misrepresented available research on its harmful effects. Here, an examination of the findings of available studies indicates that the Commission's basic assumptions about pornography as a factor in violence against women appear substantially correct. Ramifications of the present conflict of ideologies between groups having access to the same research data are discussed. Research is needed on the prevalence of violence in pornography that takes into account the shifts in what pornographic images are in vogue over time. In The Role of Social Scientists in Policy Decision Making about Pornography: A Reply to Page, Linz (U of California, Santa Barbara) & Donnerstein deny a shift in their interpretation of the data, offer a more complete description of the role social science data should play in this issue, assert their commitment to an elucidation of external environmental factors that can elicit assaultive behavior, & criticize the Commission because of its emphasis on sexual explicitness at the expense of sexual violence. In On Linz and Donnerstein's View of Pornography Research, Page replies that little if any new information has emerged since 1986 to clarify the matter. Although Linz & Donnerstein are lauded for clarifying their views & acknowledging their inconsistencies, it is argued that this necessitates a reinterpretation of their pornography research. 25 References. Sex of candidate & relevance of prior jobs were varied, & the effect of respondent's (R's) experience of subordinacy to a F was considered. As predicted, relevance of career experience was a primary consideration in the promotion decision. Both M & F Rs who had worked in the past under a F showed a pro-F bias in choosing among candidates with relevant career experience. No sex-linked bias was identified in the treatment of the candidates with irrelevant prior experience. 3 Tables, 60 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ A review of the literature reveals that children may hinder social, cognitive, affective, & psychomotor development by limiting themselves to gender-appropriate physical activities. Using the Physical Activity Stereotyping Index to assess the degree of gender labeling of physical activities, 357 students in grades kindergarten-6 at 2 Utah elementary schools were tested on their perceptions of gender-inappropriate activities to see if these differ by gender or grade level. Results reconfirmed that males (Ms) are more stereotypical in defining activities, but females (Fs) may be more adversely affected by their own gender-role perceptions. Further study is urged to explore whether Ms or Fs of other age groups & from different parts of the country are more flexible in labeling & choosing activities. 3 Figures, 20 References. ¶ To explore the existence of gender stereotypes in identifications & descriptions of target persons, who the Ss knew personally & considered to be intelligent, 2 studies were conducted: (1) characteristics of an intelligent adult were rated via questionnaire by a sample of the general population (N = 152); & (2) characteristics of an intelligent pupil were similarly rated by a group of 69 parents. Findings show that the image of the intelligent person, whether adult or pupil, consists of many qualities. However, problem-solving skills are seen as the essence of adult intelligence, & school success, of pupils' intelligence. Traditional gender stereotypes were found in images of pupils' intelligence as cognitive skill differences favoring boys, & of adult intelligence as social skill differences favoring women. 3 Tables, 36 References. ¶ It is questioned whether the dramatic inroads made by US females (Fs) during the 1970s into a select number of traditionally male (M) occupations actually represent progress for Fs. A queuing perspective is used to explore whether Fs' gains represent genuine integration, ghettoization, or resegregation, & whether Fs gained economically from occupational feminization. Case studies of fourteen occupations that became feminized during the 1970s reveal that Fs' occupational & economic progress relative to Ms was disappointing: Fs gained access to traditionally M occupations because the occupations had lost much of their attractiveness to Ms & were becoming less advantageous for Fs as well. The desegregation of census occupational titles masked substantial internal segregation. In those occupations where the wage gap did decline, it did so more because of declines in the real earnings of Ms than because of increases in that of Fs. 3 Tables, 42 References. ¶ The theoretical perspective originally developed by Candace West & Don H. Zimmerman ("Doing Gender," Gender & Society, 1987, 1, 125-151)–wherein gender is viewed as a dynamic, interactional accomplishment rather than a categorical status--is drawn on to explore how both gender & race-ethnicity are reinforced & affirmed among 152 Chicana white-collar workers in a major public university in Calif. Data from a 1989/90 mail survey & in-depth interviews with 35 randomly selected respondents reveal that the tasks performed in the workplace, sex-&-race/ethnic discrimination & harassment, & the female-associated tasks Chicanas continue to do at home, all intensify their accomplishment of gender as well as reinforce occupational segregation. Moreover, Chicanas' attachment to family is linked ideologically to the survival of the Chicano culture, rendering their accomplishment of gender an overt act of racial-ethnic & cultural politics. 49 References. ¶ An index of attitudes toward homosexuality was developed using data from a national survey on AIDS (acquired immune deficiency syndrome) conducted by the Los Angeles Times in 1985 (N = 2,308 adult respondents [Rs] nationwide). Findings reveal that Rs are more likely to hold antihomosexual attitudes if they are religious, less educated, older, & Southern. In contrast to previous research, males are somewhat more antihomosexual than females. The results demonstrate that political beliefs are clearly the most powerful predictors of homosexual attitudes. Religiosity has no effect among black Rs. The fact that the effect of age is curvilinear among college-educated Rs & black Rs may likely be a Vietnam or civil rights generation effect, in which those who were more likely to fight against oppression in their youth are more likely to oppose its modern-day manifestations. 2 Tables, 8 References. Results of t-tests & chi-sqaure analyses reveal that owners were more likely to be married, have more industry experience, & have more established firms than F owners. Ms & Fs scored similarly on nurturant & dominant traits, possibly because of the high educational level in both groups. F owners hired significantly more Fs proportionately in their organizations than M owners, & descriptions of personnel policies correlated significantly in the F owner-F employee combination but not in other owner-employee combinations. ¶ Despite the correlation found in many studies between masculinity & self-esteem for both males (Ms) & females (Fs), agentic traits in adolescence, also described as masculine or instrumental, are hypothesized to predict self-esteem in young adulthood for Ms only, while communal traits, also described as feminine or expressive, are hypothesized to do this for Fs only. A sample of 192 M & 462 F young adults from Los Angeles County, Calif, who had responded to questionnaires while in grades 7-9 in 1976 were retested on various personality scales in 1980 & 1984 (data drawn from M. Results of confirmatory factor analyses models with latent variables & path models support both hypotheses. ¶ A sample of 73 female (F) & 57 male (M) undergraduates at the U of South Florida rated 5 schematic figures of each gender, in which only the breast or chest size differed, in terms of their own, the ideal, & the average breast/chest size. The students also rated their choices using an adjectival checklist. ANOVAs yielded a gender-by-rating-type interaction for breast sizes. Ms' ratings of the ideal breast size were significantly higher than those of Fs. Both Ms & Fs believed that the average M preferred a breast size significantly larger than the size preferred by the average F. For chest size, there was a significant main effect for rating type; the size the students believed was preferred by Ms was larger than the size they believed was preferred by Fs, & this size was also larger than the ideal chest size. For both Ms & Fs, their current size was significantly smaller than the ideal or preferred size ratings. Positive adjectives were attributed more often to larger breast/chest size ratings. Findings explain the societal preoccupation with breast/chest size, the dissatisfaction of Fs with their breast size, & the presence of cosmetic breast surgery. 1 Table, 2 Figures, 12 References. ¶ An examination of post-Marxism, an emergent sociotheoretical position defined by its rejection of Marxian revisionism, considered specifically as represented by the self-proclaimed post-Marxist social theory of Anthony Giddens, Fred Block, Ernesto Laclau, & Chantal Mouffe. Following a discussion of post-Marxism's epistemic, functional, & genetic critiques of the Marxian tradition, post-Marxism itself is subjected to these same three types of criticism. Here it is argued that post-Marxism is actually anti-Marxism, because it: (1) hypostatizes Marxism's substantive theoretical postulates, falsely constituting Marxism as a paradigm in need of transcendence; (2) substitutes conformist theoretical & practical goals for Marxism's self-consciously emancipatory & revolutionary intent; & (3) ignores the inherently aesthetic dimension of Marxism, the source of its unique cultural meaning. Thus, Marxian revisionism is defended here, in particular, as it is represented by the Frankfurt school of critical theory, against its post-Marxist critics. 26 References. AA

¶ V. I. Lenin's "On the Significance of Militant Materialism" (V. I. Lenin, Selected Works, Vol 3, New York: International Publishers, 1967) suggests using dialectical materialism as a developed critical thinking method, & by extension, as a method of scholarship. Lenin considered critical thinking as a logical problem in which things & phenomena existing as such were distinguished from the isolation of concepts in formal abstractions. Dialectical materialism acknowledges the diversity of objective reality independent of consciousness. It rejects as limited any nondialectical use of formal logic for identifying objective & historical knowledge. The case of agricultural commodity relations in the western US (subsistence farming) illustrates the dialectical evolution of individual elements. 23 References. J. Sadler

Lim, Jie-Hyun (Hanyang U, Seoul 133 Republic Korea), Marx's Theory of Imperialism and the Irish National Question, IM Science and Society, 1992, 56, 2, summer, 163-178.

¶ Karl Marx's & Frederick Engles's journalistic writings on national issues, particularly on Irish nationalism, are examined to show that their rudimentary recognition of imperialism as the new historical reality of the modern world helped them to overcome the Eurocentric & capital-centric view contained in their earlier historical materialist conceptions of the nation. Ephraim Nimni's argument that Marx & Engles viewed the French revolution as the paradigm for national development ("Marx, Engels and the National Question," Science & Society, 1989, 53, 3) is critically assessed, as is Enzo Traverso's & Michael Lowy's politically oriented analysis ("The Marxist Approach to the National Question: A Critique of Nimni's Interpretation," Science & Society, 1990, 54, 2) of Marx's writings on nationalism. It is concluded that Marx's implicit theory of imperialism presaged V. I. Lenin's theory of national self-determination, & that Marx's writings on the Irish question bridged the gap between the founders of Marxism in the classical era of capitalism & Lenin in the era of imperialism. 20 References. ¶ The current crisis of Marxism, as evidenced by the downfall of communist regimes in Eastern Europe, is not the first such crisis, but it may well be the last. Analysis reveals that many crises befell Marxist thought from its very beginning. The fact that Marxist revolutions did not occur as predicted in the most advanced industrialized countries & the resulting debates over developing communism in one country vs worldwide revolution illustrated the vagueness inherent in Karl Marx's prediction of rule by the proletarian dictatorship. Not only were analytical theories & strategic orientations the subject of continuous controversy, but even the very concept of history underwent constant modification. A theory of alternative ecology is suggested in lieu of discredited communist philosophy as the way to a viable future. Adapted from the source document as translated by M. Meeks.

¶ The growth of national liberation movements in the face of continuing economic colonization is a topic among progressive intellectuals in the Americas, eg, Enrique Dussel. Since a second independence & the establishment of democratic systems are in progress, new philosophies responding to the sociohistorical needs of the present & future Latin America are in order. Enrique Dussel (Praxis latinoamericana y filosofía de la liberación (Latin American Praxis and Philosophy of Liberation), Bogota: Edit. N.A., 1983) has proposed a "liberation of philosophy" from the European tradition & a "philosophy of liberation" adequate to the Latin American context. Dussel's philosophy, close to Karl Marx's, has posited a series of philosophical principles, the first premise of which is a praxis for the liberation of the oppressed. Dussel establishes a directly proportional relationship between dependence & national liberation. He develops an anti-imperialist line in all his work & defines the unequal development of technology across central & peripheral countries as a symptom of oppression. M. Pflum

Fein, Melvyn L., Personality Disorders or Role Negotiation Problems?, Clinical Sociology Review, 1991, 9, 37-47.

¶ Definitions of personality disorders in the American Psychiatric Assoc's Diagnostic & Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-III-R, 1987) underrate the social & relationship nature of these disorders. Here, it is argued that personality disorders may be described more accurately as role negotiations. Background on social roles & the role negotiation perspective is provided. Two examples from DSM-III–the passive-aggressive & the histrionic personality–are examined, demonstrating how they evolve from role-negotiation tactics. 38 References. Fritz, Jan M. (Dept Sociology California State U, San Bernardino 92407-2397), The Emergence of American Clinical Sociology: The First Courses, Clinical Sociology Review, 1991, 9, 15-26.

¶ Courses in clinical sociology offered in US universities beginning in 1928 are described. The earliest courses were offered at the U of Chicago, New York U, Tulane U, & Antioch Coll. A 1929 proposal for a clinical sociology department at Yale U is reviewed. Clinical sociology proposes a continuing humanistic analysis of beliefs, policies & practices, & suggestions for intervention. The early courses, 1928-1954, focused on case analysis at individual or small-group level. Reasons why courses called clinical sociology were not institutionalized in the 1930s & 1940s include the interdisciplinary focus of the courses, & the shift away from clinical work. 73 References. ¶ Foster care & out-of-wedlock births in the US are explored, drawing on the role of clinical sociology in defining, analyzing, & mitigating or solving social problems. The rapid increase in the number of foster children has overwhelmed the judicial & child welfare systems. The foster care situation is made more difficult by the declining numbers of foster parents & the 1980 passage of the Juvenile Justice & Delinquency Prevention Act, which was intended to discourage foster placements but has had the opposite effect. The rate of out-of-wedlock births has also increased dramatically. The primary concern lies with very young, poorly educated teenage girls who are unable to support themselves & their children. It is suggested that clinical sociologists can play an important role in addressing these problems through: translating theories for practical use, critically assessing the possible effects of a particular theoretical approach on the work undertaken, & providing theoretical perspective when the situation warrants. Additionally, a sociologist's training provides skills in understanding the social system & the effects of membership in overlapping systems & providing intervention assistance. It is concluded that a successful approach to solving social problems will require a team effort that must also involve historians, journalists, social workers, community coalitions, & philanthropic & voluntary associations. 37 References. ¶ The usual focus on the distinction between labor & capital inhibits sociological study of banking, even though banks operate at the margin of the monetarily differentiated economic system. However, new approaches, including social act theory & communication theory, may stimulate study of the organizational structure of banking. Links can be seen between a sociological communication theory & a cybernetic theory of observing systems. A new view of banking is developed–as a system for trading promises of payment. The sociological observation of promises as a facet of complex communication provides insights into the structure of the contemporary economy. 33 References. A Chronicle of the Relationship between a [French] Parent Company and Its [Brazilian] Subsidiary), UM Sociologie du Travail, 1992, 34, 2, 193-207. (FRE)

¶ The degree of successful cooperation between & within the work groups of two companies is dependent on norms of professional ethics & production. To illustrate, the case of a French parent firm that manufactures heavy products, eg, gas & hydroelectric turbines, & its Brazilian subsidiary is described. These firms had had to raise their level of technology to compete with a multinational German industrial giant & a foreign-licensed Brazilian industrial firm. Although technology transfers within a company have a great effect on conflict or cooperation in work groups, the interface between the two countries' occupational cultures & technological policies is also significant. Balancing production operatives in a competitive market with the spirit of cooperation noted here fosters technological transfers & innovative practices. 8 References. ¶ The degree to which ownership & control are reunited in management buyouts (MBs) is examined through interviews with management personnel involved in 40 MBs occurring in Scotland 1982-1989, & interviews with employees of 12 institutions that fund MBs in Scotland. Only a small proportion of total MB finance comes from the issue of voting shares, which allows the buyout team to maintain majority control of the voting equity. However, particularly in formerly private firms, they hold a smaller proportion of voting shares than the previous owners & are forced by financial institutions, in exchange for their role in providing equity & debt finance, to enforce conditions that potentially constrain management & operations. It is argued that MBs do not reverse the separation of ownership & control. 5 Tables, 18 References. Adapted from the source document. ¶ An analysis of the modernization program in the Chinese electronics industry contrasts the established practice of transfering licenses (& technology) with newer options such as joint ventures. Operations modeled on large Western firms encourage industrial development through the joint venture approach, while mixed corporations established by foreign capital (from Hong Kong, Taiwan, or expatriate Chinese) tend toward transfer of licenses rather than dissemination of technological information. Western-style joint ventures depend on a market independent of the state & expertise in the latest technologies, which explains their limited impact in China. The two methods coexist, with different impacts on the economy. 1 Table, 2 Figures. Adapted from the source document as translated by J. Sadler. ¶ Adult Hungarian attitudes toward entrepreneurship were explored in a 1988 survey (N not specified). Results indicate that about 25% of respondents (Rs) would like to start a business; the level of interest was markedly higher among Rs under 35 & among more highly educated workers, while ethnic background & party membership were not significant. Workers not favorably disposed toward starting their own business mentioned personal reasons such as age, lack of ability, unavailability of capital, & tax policies; ideology was not usually a reason. The creation of new business would probably lead to increased income differentiation & new social tensions. Though potential entrepreneurs are more inclined to take risks than the population at large, they share the same concerns about social security issues. 3 Tables, 3 Figures. Banks, Marcus (51 Banbury Rd, Oxford OX2 6PE England), Experience and Reality in Ethnographic Film, Visual Sociology Review, 1990, 5, 2, winter, 30-33.
¶ A call for phenomenological interpretations of ethnographic films, more generally for the return of phenomenological analyses to cultural anthropological theory. Ethnographic films are generally undervalued in anthropological teaching & research; they are either used as an introductory teaching aid, to present an impressionistic overview of a society or culture, or dismissed for their apparent trivialization & naive attempts to represent reality. Yet the apparent realism of ethnographic films can be their greatest strength by reminding anthropologists of the uniqueness of instances of cultural action, even if conventional forms of analysis tend to group instances together into categories & trends. The difficulty with a phenomenological interpretation of an ethnographic film is that the viewer is rarely able to draw on personal experience to interpret the events depicted; however, it is suggested that certain shooting & editing styles may help point the way to such a reading. 11 References. Canevacci, Massimo (U Rome, I-00185 Italy), Image Accumulation and Cultural Syncretism, Theory, Culture & Society, 1992, 9, 3, Aug, 95-110.
¶ Several aspects of visual communication in Brazil are examined to provide criteria for producing a preliminary map of the territory of Brazilian communications. Based on field research, a working hypothesis is developed that links the overwhelming accumulation of images with Brazil's cultural syncretism & its telenovelas (TV dramas) network, which uses interactive video to both entertain & monitor the attitudes of specific social classes. The power of telenovelas to shape the public mind is discussed, & their status as a national treasure second only to that of soccer is examined. It is concluded that Brazil is a paradigmatic field in which to study a pre- & postmodern context for the accumulation of images, while also representing an opportunity to overcome the Third World crisis of the multiplcation of syncretized cultural identities. 8 References. Francis, Roy G. (U South Florida, Tampa 33620), Teaching Students to See, Visual Sociology Review, 1991, 6, 1, summer, 44-46.
¶ The process of teaching students to see critically is explored, especially as it is involved in visual sociology. Defining the biological sequence of perception is insufficient because the process is more complex: making sense of raw perception depends at least as much on a viewer's personal & cultural history as on physical abilities. The inherently active process of seeing a video is described, & its fundamental relation to the process of representation is demonstrated. It is argued that students benefit from creating representations; it is crucial to their understanding of how still pictures assume life-like qualities, which in turn helps them to discern the ways that all texts, written or visual, operate. Translated by Howard S. Becker.
¶ The role of ethnographic photography as a form of visual sociology is explored. Photography facilitates perception & understanding of other cultures, which makes it a valuable tool that can capture indigenous reality respectfully–as more than just something unexpected & bizarre. This is demonstrated through a description of a 1987 encounter with a group of Brazilian isolados (isolated groups), probably Arara Indians, who emerged at an advance camp in Liberdade, in northern Brazil. As part of a project to document isolated tribial groups as they live & as they come into contact with civilization, photographs were taken of the Arara. The project was designed to record the battle for self-determination & preservation of the more than 100 tribal cultures that exist in Brazil. 6 Photographs. M. Maguire

Papson, Stephen D. (Saint Lawrence U, Canton NY 13617), Looking at Nature: The Politics of Landscape Photography, Visual Sociology Review, 1991, 6, 1, summer, 4-12.
¶ The question of whether a nature photograph can be read as an ideological text is explored in an analysis of two Nathan Farb Adirondack landscape photographs. Farb's way of seeing nature is traced to the emergence of the nineteenth-century bourgeoisie & the transcendental philosophy of Ralph Waldo Emerson & Henry David Thoreau, in which nature is positioned as an alternative to modernity & urban existence. The nature photographs here contain three levels of discourse: substantive, technical, & aesthetic. As a photograph moves through these levels, both its exchange value & its sign value increase. The ambivalent relationship between the photograph & its subject is examined, along with the ideological boundaries of alternative ways of photographing nature. It is concluded that the realistic landscape photograph is deeply rooted in the history of the US bourgeoisie, & its value as a commodity-sign is a function of bourgeois economics. 37 References. ¶ Personal experience teaching visual sociology to undergraduates at Doshisha U in Japan is recounted, focusing on the unspoken yet conflicting cultural assumptions about education. The Japanese students were not comfortable with commenting on other students' work or offering opinions about lectures or readings; thus the US professor had to assume the full burden of class discussion. In addition, students assumed that completing projects was unrelated to passing the class. These cultural differences suggest that approaches to education vary & that any professor teaching in a foreign country faces many challenges. M. Maguire

¶ In a discussion of the ideological gulf that separates photographic art, it is questioned whether photography has a special claim in the truth or if it is more properly an artistic form of self-expression. While it might seem that this issue cannot be settled as long as the two forms of photography continue to coexist, it is possible to consider the ways in which the communicative frame of photojournalism allows the division to be bridged. To that end, the rhetoric of art historians, museum curators, & photojournalists is analyzed, foregrounding their claims about art & truth. Works by Beaumont Newhall, John Szarkowski, & Adam Weinberg receive special mention. 9 References. M. Maguire (Copyright 1993, Sociological Abstracts, Inc., all rights reserved.)

¶ The president of the International Visual Sociology Assoc explores some underlying assumptions of the field. Visual sociologists take seriously the idea that "you can see a lot just by looking" as they critically examine visual representations & the process of looking & seeing. Based on an "unmasking imperative," visual sociology relies on healthy skepticism & a questioning posture toward social data. It is acknowledged that unpacking "appearances"–apparent realities–is inescapably political to both the observer & the subject. The field's contemporary challenge is to draft new methodologies. M.
